He intended so to do. But what man could say this? Who knoweth the mind of Christ but the Spirit of God? Compare 1 Cor. ii. 11." Wordsw. But it may be doubted whether this is either a safe or a sober comment. ἤθελεν has here but a faint subjective reference, and is more nearly the "would have passed by them" of the E. V. See on Luke xxiv. 28, for the meaning. Lange, Leben Jesu, ii. p. 788 note, well remarks, that this $\eta\theta\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\nu$ $\pi\alpha\rho\epsilon\lambda\theta\epsilon\hat{\imath}\nu$, and the $\eta\theta\epsilon\lambda\sigma\nu$

οὖν of John vi. 21, mutually explain one another. 50.] πάντες . . . ἐταράχθ., peculiar to Mark. After this follows the history respecting Peter, which might naturally be omitted here if this Gospel were drawn up under his inspection-but this is at least doubtful in any general sense.

3. πυγμη] This word has perplexed all the Commentators. Of the various renderings which have been given of it, two are excluded by their not being grammatical—(1) that which makes it mean 'up to the elbow' (Euthym. and Thl.); 'including the hand as far as the wrist,' Lightf.: (2) 'having clenched the hand,' 'facto pugno' (Grot. and others).

The two meanings between which our choice lies are, (3) 'frequently' (as E. V. 'oft,' and Vulg. 'crebro'), taking πυγμη $=\pi \nu \kappa \nu \hat{\eta} = \pi \nu \kappa \nu \hat{\omega} s$, which however is not very probable: or (4), to which I most incline, and which Kuinoel gives, 'sedulo,' 'fortiter,' diligently; πυγμή, he observes, meaning 'the fist,' answers in the LXX to the word אַנהֹף, see reff. But this same word אָנִרֹּף is used to signify strength and fortitude, and strong men are called in the Rabbinical writings בעלי אגרופין, 'lords of fists.' No reason that we know can be assigned why our Lord should take aside this man, and the blind man, ch. viii. 23; but how many might there be which we do not know,such as some peculiarity in the man himself, or the persons around, which influenced His determination. remarkable that the same medium of conveying the miraculous cure is used also in ch. viii. 23. By the symbolic use of external means, our Lord signified the healing virtue for afflicted human kind, which resides in and proceeds from Him incarnate in our flesh. He uses either his own touch, -something from Himself, -or the cleansing element to which He so often Possibly this was a conclusion drawn in the mind of the narrator, not altogether identical with that to be drawn from our account here-for the leaven of Herod could not be doctrine (kai 7. 5. seems to answer to the ζ. Σαδδουκαίων in Matt. But we must not infer from this that Herod was a Sadducee. He certainly was a bad and irreligious man, which would be quite enough ground for such a caution. We have a specimen of the morals of his court in the history of John the Baptist's martyrdom. In the last ούπω, ver. 21, Meyer sees a new climax, and refers the not yet to the moment even after the reminiscence of vv. 18-20. It may doubtless be so, and the idea would well accord with the graphic precision of St. Mark.

appears to have been Bethsaïda Julias, on the N.E. side of the lake. Compare ver. 13: and see on this Bethsaïda, Jos. Antt. xviii. 4. 6: B. J. iii. 10. 7: Plin. Nat. Hist. v. 15. Wieseler, Chron. Synops. p. 273 f. See however against the idea that there were two Bethsaïdas, The Land and the Book, pp. 373 f. 23.] The leading of this blind man out of the town appears as if it had been from some local reason. In ver. 26 we find him forbidden expressly to enter into or tell it in the town, and with a repetition of κώμη, which looks as if the place had been somehow unworthy of such a work being done there. (This is a serious objection against Meyer's reason, that the use of spittle in both miracles occasioned the same privacy here and in ch. vii. 33.) Or we may perhaps find the reason in our Lord's immediate departure to such a distance (ver. 27); and say, that He did not wish multitudes to gather about and follow Him.

πτύσας . . . ἐπιθεὶς . . .] See above on ch. We cannot say what may have induced our Lord to perform this miracle at twice-certainly not the reason assigned by Dr. Burton, "that a blind man would not, on suddenly recovering his sight, know one object from another, because he had never seen them before,' and so would require a double miracle; -a second to open the eyes of his mind also, to comprehend what he saw. This assumes the man to have been born blind, which he was not, from ver. 24; for how should be know how trees appeared? and besides, the case of the man born blind in John ix. required no such double healing. These things were in the Lord's power, and He ordered them as He pleased from present circumstances, or for our instruc-24.] I see men, because I see them walking as it were trees; i. e. not distinct in individual peculiarity, but as trees in the hedge-row flit by the traveller. It is a minute mark of truth, that he describes the appearance of persons as he doubtless had often had occasion to do during the failing of sight which had ended in his blindness. By no possibility can the words convey, as Wordsw., three different stages of returning vision: "I see men. I see them standing still, and dimly, as trees. I see them walking." For thus the ore is altogether passed over, and περιπατούντας taken out of its government, and most unnaturally made into a sentence by itself. 25.] The distinction in the text here adopted, between διέβλεψεν and ἐνέβλεπεν, would be he saw clearly (the work of that instant), and was thoroughly restored, and (thenceforward) saw all things plainly. 31—IX. 1.] ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS APPROACHING DEATH AND RESURECTION. REBUKE OF PETER. Matt. xvi. 21—28. Luke ix. 22—27. Luke omits the rebuke of Peter. Mark adds, ver. 32. παβρησία τ. λ. ἐλάλει: and, in the rebuke of Peter, that the Lord said the words ίδων τους μαθητάς αυτού. In vv. 34, 35, the agreement is close, except that Luke adds καθ' ἡμέραν, att. τον στ. αὐτοῦ, and Mark καὶ τοῦ εὐαγγ. aft. ἐμοῦ, ver. 35 (it Vol. I.

is perhaps worthy of remark that St. Mark writes ἀκολουθεῖν in ver. 34: possibly from the information of him, to whom it was said, τί πρός σε; σύ μοι ἀκολούθει, John xxi. 22); and informs us, in ver. 34, that our Lord said these words, having called the multitude with his disciples. This Meyer calls a contradiction to Matt. and Luke,—and thinks it arose from a misunderstanding of Luke's πάντας. Far rather should I say that our account represents every detail to the life, and that the mpds πάντας contains traces of it. What wonder that a crowd should here, as every

Not, 'they kept the command:'for συνζητ. explains it to mean kept secret the saying, as in ref. Dan. τὸ ἐκ ν. ἀν. does not refer to the Resurrection generally, for it was an article of Jewish belief, and connected with the times of the Messiah :- but to His Resurrection as connected with His Death; the whole was enigmatical to them.

11.] The oti may be merely recitantis, they asked him, saying (that) the Scribes say, that Elias must first come:' leaving ἐπηρώτων to find its application in the difficulty thus suggested by them. But it is better to take it in the unusual sense (undoubted there) of ver. 28 [see Moulton on Winer, p. 208, note 4]: see further on in this note. 12.] Meyer and others place the interrogation after Tou ἀνθρώπου, and regard ίνα πολ. . . . as its answer. But not to mention that such a sentence would be without example in our Lord's discourses, the sense given by it is meagre in the extreme. As it stands in the text, it forms a counter-question to that of the Apostles in ver. 11. They asked, How say the Scribes that Elias must first come? Our Lord answers it by telling them that it is even so; and returns the question by another: And how is it (also) written of the Son of Man, that He, &c.? then comes the conclusion in ver. 13 with αλλα λέγω ύμιν, stating that Elias has come, and leaving it therefore to be inferred that the sufferings of the Son of Man were close at hand. binds both together. Just as the first coming of the Son of Man is to suffer and to die, so has the first coming of Elias been as it was written of him; but there is a future coming of Elias ἀποκαθιστάνειν πάντα, and of the Son of Man in glory. See further in notes on Matt. 14-29.] HEALING OF A POSSESSED NATIC. Matt. xvii. 14-21. Luke ix. LUNATIC. Matt. xvii. 14—21. Luke ix. 37—42. The account of Mark is by far the most copious: and here, which is very rarely the case in the official life of our Lord, the three accounts appear to have been originally different and independent. The descent from the mountain was on the day following the transfiguration, Luke ver. 37. 14.] The Scribes were probably boasting over the disciples, and reasoning from their inability to that of their Master also. As Stier remarks, there is hardly such another contrast to be found in the Gospel as this, between the open heaven and the sons of glory on the mount, and the valley of tears with its terrible forms of misery and pain and unbelief. I have already in the notes to Matt. spoken of the noble use made of this contrast in the last and grandest picture of the greatest of painters—the Transfiguration of Raffaelle. Lord's countenance probably retained traces of the glory on the mount; so strong a word as ἐξεθαμβήθησαν would hardly have been used merely of their surprise at His sudden approach: see Exod. xxxiv. 29, 30. That brightness, however, terrifted the people: this attractc them: see 2 Cor. iii. 7—18.

ήμας] The ignorant and weak one. wretched father counts his child's misery his own: thus the Syrophœnician woman, Matt. xv. 25, βοήθει μοι. 23. In Tò εί δ. [πισ.], the τό involves the sense in some difficulty. The most probable rendering is to make it designatory of the whole sentence, Jesus said to him the saying, "If thou canst believe, all things are," &c.: a saying which doubtless He often uttered on similar occasions. Kuinoel quotes a similar construction from Polyænus, iii. 9. 11, Ἰφικράτης ὑπολαβὼν έφη τὸ τίς αν ήλπισε τοῦτο ἔσεσθαι. Some (e.g. Tischdf.) omitting the πιστεῦσαι would set an interrogation after δύνη, and suppose our Lord to be citing the father's words: "didst thou say, 'if thou canst?'—all things are," &c. Others, as Dr. Burton, suppose it to mean τὸ 'εἰ δύνη' πίστευσαι (imperative):- 'Believe what you have expressed by your εί τι δύνη, &c.' But both these renderings involve methods of construction and expression not usual in the Gospels. The εί δύνη is a manifest reference to the εί τι δύνη before, and meant to convey a reproof, as the father's answer testifies. The sentence, also, unless I am mistaken, is meant to convey an intimation that the healing was not to be an answer to the et τι δύνη, so that the Lord's power was to be challenged and proved, -but an answer to faith, which (of course by laying hold on Him who πάντα δύναται) can do all 24.] Nothing can be more touching and living than this whole most masterly and wonderful narrative. poor father is drawn out into a sense of the unworthiness of his distrust, and "the little spark of faith which is kindled in his soul reveals to him the abysmal deeps of unbelief which are there." (Trench, p. 367.) "Thus," remarks Olshausen (B. Comm. i. 534), "does the Redeemer shew himself to the father as a μαιευτής πίστεως first, before He heals his son. In the struggle of his anxiety, the strength of Faith is born, by the aid of Christ, in the soul empty of it before." strong analogy in the Lord's treatment of the father here, for the sponsorial engagement in infant baptism. The child is by its infirmity incapacitated; it is thereby its infirmity incapacitated; it is therefore the father's faith which is tested, and when that is proved, the child is healed. The fact is, that the analogy rests far deeper: viz. on the 'inclusion' of 'the old man' in Adam and the 'new man' in Christ: see Rom. v. 12—21. It may be well to remind the reader that there is nothing "more pathetic and expressive" (Wordsw.) in μου τῆ ἀπιστία than in τ. ἀπ. μου: see on Matt. xvi. 18.

is emphatic, as opposed to the want of power on the part of the disciples. This is the only place where we have such a charge as μηκέτι εἰςέλθ. εἰς αὐ.,—shewing the excessive malignity and tenacity of this kind (see ver. 29) of spirit. This is also shewn by ver. 26. 27.7 See ch. v. 41; also Matt. xvii. 6, 8: Rev. i. 17: Dan. x. 9, 10. 29. The answer is given more at length in Matt. ver. 20, and the Lord there distinctly includes the disciples in the $\gamma \epsilon \nu \epsilon \dot{\alpha}$ $\ddot{\alpha}\pi i \sigma \tau o s$, by telling them $\delta i \dot{\alpha}$ $\tau \dot{\eta} \nu$ $\dot{\alpha}\pi i \sigma \tau (a\nu)$ $\dot{\nu} \mu \dot{\omega} \nu$. GREATEST AMONG THEM. Matt. xviii. 1-9. Luke ix. 46-50. Here again the three accounts are independent, and differ in some particulars unimportant in themselves, but very instructive for a right comparison of the three Gospels. First take Luke's account.—The disciples had been disputing;—our Lord knowing the strife of their hearts, took a child, &c .-Then compare Mark-our Lord asked them, on coming into a house, what had been the subject of their dispute; -they were silent from shame; -He sat down, delivered his sentence to the twelve,—and then took the child, &c .- Lastly turn to Matt. There, the disciples themselves referred the question to our Lord, and He took the child, &c. Who can forbear seeing in these narratives the unfettered and independent testimony of three witnesses, consistent with one another in the highest form and spirit of truthfulness, but differing in the mere letter? Mark's account is again the richest and fullest, and we can hardly doubt that if the literal exact detail of fact is in question, we have it here. 33. Between the coming to Capernaum, and this discourse, happened the demand of the tribute money, Matt. xvii. 24—27. 34.] There is no real difference in the matter in question here (and in Luke), and in Matt. This man actually did what the very Apostles themselves were specially appointed to do: and our Lord, so far from prohibiting, encourages him: see Num. xi. 26—29. 39.] See 1 Cor. xii. 3. The very success of the miracle will awe him, and prevent him from soon or lightly speaking evil of me. We must beware of supposing that the application of this saying is to be confined to the working of a miracle-ver. 40 shews that it is general-a weighty maxim of Christian toleration and charity, and caution to men how they presume to limit the work of the Spirit of God to any sect, or succession, or outward form of Church: cf. Phil. i. 16-18. See the way in which the nearly opposite inference is extracted from the words, in the very curious note of Bp. Wordsw. here. 40. This saying is not inconsistent with that in Matt. xii. 30. They do not refer to the same thing. This is said of outward conformity-that, of inward unity of purpose-two widely different things. On that saying, see note there. On this, we may say—all those who, notwithstanding outward differences of communion and government, believe in and preach Jesus Christ, without bitterly and uncharitably opposing each other, are hereby declared to be helpers forward of each other's work. O that all Christians would remember this! Stier (Red. J. iii. 24) strongly deprecates the reading $\hat{\eta}\mu\hat{\omega}\nu$ — $\hat{\eta}\mu\hat{\omega}\nu$; "The us in the mouth of our Lord here confuses and destroys nearly the whole purport of his weighty saying. For this is the very fault of the disciples, that they laid down outward and visible communion with them as the decisive criterion of communion with the Lord: and this very fault the Lord rebukes with his repudiatory ὑμῶν." Still, there is a propriety, a tempering the rebuke with a gracious reminiscence of their unity with Him, and something exceedingly suiting the χριστοῦ ἐστέ below, in ἡμῶν-ἡμῶν. In the divided state of the critical evidence, the reading must be ever doubt-41. This verse does not take up the discourse from ver. 37, as some think, but is immediately connected with ver. 40:- Even the smallest service done in my Name shall not be unrewardedmuch more should not so great an one as casting out of devils be prohibited.'

έν ὀνόματι ὅτι signifies by reason that, but not without an allusion to τ. ὄνομά μου, which furnishes the reason. χριστέστέ] The only place in the Gospels where this expression is used. Paul has it: see doubt of the discourse having been verbatim thus uttered. See note "Matt. v. 49. In order to understand this difficult verse, it will be necessary first to examine its connexion and composition. (1) What is yap? It connects it with the solemn assertions in vv. 43-48, καλόν ἐστίν σε . . . and furnishes a reason why it is better for us to cut off and last away, &c. mas then is every one, absolutely: referring back both to the oc, and the autûv above - maoa voic is (not opposed to (Meyer), t) parallel with πas, and κaί equivalent to just as. (2) This being stated, let us now enquire into the symbolic terms used. FIRE is the refiner's fire of Mal. iii. 2, to which indeed there seems to be a reference; the fire of Matt. iii. 11 and Acts ii. 3; of Ezek. xxviii. 14 (see my Hulsean Lectures for 1841, pp. 9—12). Fire is the symbol of the divine purity and presence :- our God is a consuming fire, not only to his foes, but to his people: but in them, the fire shall only burn up what is impure and requires purifying out, 1 Cor. iii. 13: 1 Pet. i. 7; iv. 12, 17. This very fire shall be to them as a preserving salt. The SALT of the covenant of God (ref. Levit.) was to be mixed with every sacrifice; and it is with fire that all men are to be salted. This fire is the divine purity and judgment in the covenant, whose promise is, 'I will dwell among them.' And in and among this purifying fire shall the people of God ever walk and rejoice everlastingly. Rev. xxi. 23. This is the right understanding of Isa. xxxiii. 14, 15, 'Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? &c. He that walketh in righteousness, &c. And thus the connexion with the preceding verses is,—'it is better for thee to cut off,' &c.—'for it is part of the salting of thee, the living sacrifice (Rom. xii. 1), that every offence and scandal must be burnt out of thee before thou canst enter into life.' 50. The connexion of this (elsewhere said in other references, Matt. v. 13: Luke xiv. 34) is now plain. If this fire which is to purify and act as a preserving salt to you, have, from the nullity and vapidity of the grace of the covenant in you, no such power,it can only consume—the salt has lost its savour—the covenant is void—you will be cast out, as it is elsewhere added, and the fire will be no longer the fire of purification, but of wrath eternal. I will just add that the interpretation of the sacrifice as the condemned-and the fire and salt as eternal fire,-except in the case of the salt having lost its savour, is

CHAP. X. 1—12.] REPLY TO THE PHARISEES' QUESTION CONCERNING DIVORCE. Matt. xix. 1—12. 1. καὶ πέραν] Our Lord retired, after His discourses to the Jews in John x. and before the raising of Lazarus, to Bethany (John i. 28; x. 40) beyond Jordan, and thence made his last journey to Jerusalem; so that in the attributed to δ ποιήσας ἀπ' ἀρχης. The parallel is most instructive. In Matt. this saying forms part of the discourse with the Jews. Here again Mark furnishes us with the exact circumstantial account of the matter. On the addition, Matt. vv. 10-12, see notes there. We may notice, that Mark omits Matt.'s κατὰ πῶσαν αἰτίαν in ver. 2,—and his μὴ ἐπὶ πορνεία in ver. 11; as also does Luke (xvi. 18). The one omission seems to involve the other. The report here gives the enquiry without this particular exception. As a general rule, Mark, so accurate in circumstantial details, is less exact than Matt. in preserving the order and connexion of the discourses. 12.] This verse corresponds to δ ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσας μοιχάται in Matt. ver. 9 - but it is

expressed as if the woman were the active party, and put away her husband, which was allowed by Greek and Roman law (see 1 Cor. vii. 13), but not by Jewish (see Deut. xxiv. 1: Jos. Antt. xv. 7. 10). This alteration in the verbal expression may have originated in the source whence Mark's report was drawn. On μοιχᾶται, Grotius remarks, 'Mulier, cum domina sui non sit, si, marito relicto, ad aliud matrimonium se conferat, omnino adulterium committit, non interpretatione aliqua, aut per consequentiam, sed directe: ideo non debuit hic addi, επ' αὐτόν.

but as in Luke, infants ($\beta \rho \epsilon \phi \eta$): and our Lord was not to teach them, but only to touch, and pray over them. This simple, seemingly superstitious application of oi προςφέροντες (perhaps not the mothers only) the disciples, interrupted in their converse on high and important subjects, despise and reprove. 14. We can hardly read our Lord's solemn saying, without seeing that it reaches further than the mere then present occasion. It might one day become a question whether the new Christian covenant of repentance and faith could take in the unconscious infant, as the old covenant did :--whether when Jesus was no longer on earth, little children might be brought to Him, dedicated to his service, and made partakers of his blessing? Nay, in the pride of the human intellect, this question was sure one day to be raised: and our Lord furnishes the Church, by anticipation, with an answer to it for all ages. Not only may the little infants be brought to Him, -but in order for us who are mature to come to Him, we must cast away all that wherein our maturity has caused us to differ from them, and become LIKE THEM. Not only is Infant Baptism justified, but it is (abstractedly considered;not as to preparation for it, which from the nature of the case is precluded) the NORMAL'PATTERN OF ALL BAPTISM; none can enter God's kingdom, except as an infant. In adult baptism, the exceptional case (see above), we strive to secure that state of simplicity and childlikeness, which in the infant we have ready and undoubted to our hands. 16.] κατευλόγει, like all such compounds, is more forcible and complete than the simple verb would have been. It may be rendered He fervently blessed them.

17-31.] ANSWER TO AN ENQUIRER RESPECTING ETERNAL LIFE, AND DISCOURSE THEREUPON. Matt. xix. 16-30. Luke xviii. 18-30. On the different form of our Lord's answer in Matt., see notes there. As it here stands, so far from giving any countenance to Socinian error, it is a pointed rebuke of the very view of Christ which they who deny His Divinity entertain. He was no 'good Master,' to be singled out from men on account of His pre-eminence over his kind in virtue and wisdom: God sent us no such Christ as this, nor may any of the sons of men be thus called good. He was one with Him who only is good, the Son of the Father, come not to teach us merely, but to beget us anew by the divine power which dwells in Him. The low view then, which this applicant takes of Him and his office, He at once rebukes and annuls, as He had done before in the case of Nicodemus: see John iii. 1 ff. and notes.

The dilemma, as regards the Socinians, has been well put (see Stier ii. 283, note): -either, "There is none good, but God: Christ is good: therefore Christ Is GoD;" -or, "There is none good, but God: Christ is not God: therefore Christ IS NOT GOOD." With regard to other points, the variations in the narratives are trifling, but instructive--εί δὲ θέλ. εἰς τ. ζ. εἰς. τήρ. τ. ἐντ. λέγει αὐτῷ, Ποίας ; ὁ δὲ Ἰησ. εἶπεν Τό. (Matt.) = τὰς ἐντολὰς oloas (Mark and Luke) without any break in the discourse. Similarly, in Matt., the young (Matt.) ruler (Luke) asks, ver. 20, τί ἔτι ὑστερῶ; but in Mark and Luke, Jesus says to him (and here with the remarkable addition of έμβλ. αὐτ. ήγ. αὐτ.), εν σε ύστερεί (or σοι λείπει). Such notices as these shew the point at which, not short of which nor beyond which, we may expect the Evangelists to be in accord; viz. in that inner truthfulness of faithful report which reflects to us the teaching of the Lord, but does not depend on slavish literal exactitude; which latter if we require, we overthrow their testimony, and most effectually do the work of our adversaries. 17.] εἰς ὁδόν, out of the house, ver. 10, to continue His journey, ver. 32. The running and the kneeling are both found in the graphic St. Mark only. 19.] Mark here takes exactly the commandments of the second table,μη άποστ. standing for the tenth. Matt. adds their summary (άγαπ. τ. πλησίον σου ώς σεαυτ.), omitting (with Luke) μή άποστ., perhaps on account of μη κλ. having gone before. 21.] Notice the graphic details again, of looking on him and loving him. άρας τὸν στ. is stance of a saying of Peter's reported, without any distinction indicating that he had a share in the report. note on Matt. for the promise here made 29, 30.] Here our to the Apostles. report is most important. To it and Luke we owe νῦν ἐν τῷ καιρῷ τούτῳ, without which the promise might be understood of a future life only :- and to it alone we owe the particularizing of the returns made, and the words μετα διωγμών, which light up the whole passage, and show that it is the inheritance of the earth in the higher sense by the meek which is spoken of; -see 1 Cor. iii. 21, 22. mothers-nature gives us only one-but love, many (see Rom. xvi. 13). We do not read, fathers, perhaps because of our high and absorbing relation to our Father in heaven, cf. Matt. xxiii. 9. On Kai τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, Bp. Wordsw. observes, "See above, viii. 35, where this phrase (not found in the other Evangelists, see Matt. xvi. 25: Luke ix. 24) is inserted by St. Mark. Perhaps it made a greater impression upon his mind, because he had formerly shrunk from suffering ένεκεν τ. εὐαγγελίου. (See Acts xiii. 13; xv. 38.) St. Mark also alone here inserts our Lord's words, μετὰ διωγμῶν, perhaps from a recollection that he had been once affrighted by persecution from doing the work of the Gospel: and desiring to prepare others to encounter trials which for a time had mastered himself." Here follows in Matt. the parable of the Labourers in the vineyard, ch. xx. 1-16.

22.] ἦν γὰρ ἔχων—so 23-31.] Here our ver. 24 added here. also Matt. is a most important addition; the rest is much alike in the three. In that verse we have all misunderstanding of our Lord's saying removed, and "the proverb," as Wesley well observes (Stier ii. p. 290), "shifted to this ground: 'It is easier for a camel, &c. than for a rich man to cast off his trust in his riches." Yet the power of divine grace can and does accomplish even this. 24.7 τέκνα is remarkable and a trace of exactitude: see John xxi. 5:—so also περιβλ. ver. 23. 26.] This reiterated expression of dismay,

HIS SUFFERINGS AND DEATH. Matt. xx. 17-19. Luke xviii. 31-34. (The remarkable particulars of ver. 32 are only found here.) This was (see Matt. xvi. 21; xvii. 22) the third declaration of His sufferings which the Lord had made to the disciples, and it was His going before them, accompanied most probably by something remarkable in his gait and manner -a boldness and determination perhaps, an eagerness, denoted in Luke xii. 50, which struck them with astonishment and fear. worked were used for sacred purposes, Num. xix. 2: Deut. xxi. 3: 1 Sam. vi. 7).' Meyer. But does it never strike such annotators, that this very usage would lead not only to the narrative being so con-structed, but to the command itself having been so given? 3. ὁ κύρ..... ώδε The pres. ἀποστέλλει, is used of future things whose occurrence is undoubted; see Matt. xvii. 11; xi. 3 al.: but the words are somewhat ambiguous. From the ancient interpolation of πάλιν, it seems that they were understood all to belong to δ κύριος—'the Lord hath need of it, and will immediately send it [back]? Lachm., by printing the words without a stop, evidently adopts this rendering: and Origen, tom. xvi. in Matt. § 16, vol. iii. p. 741, favours it. But verisimilitude seems to me to be against it: and the final clause in ver. 6, καὶ ἀφῆκαν αὐτούς, appears to correspond with this. So that I would understand it as in E. V.: and straightway he (the speaker or owner) will send it hither.

4.] The report of one of those sent: qu. Peter? άμφοδ. (a road leading round a place) is probably the street: see reff. Wordsw. interprets it, 'the back way, which led round the house.' But there does not appear to be any reason for supposing the άμφι- to refer to the house, rather than to the whole block, or neighbourhood, of houses, round about which the street led. [Archbp. Trench, on the A. V. p. 116. would render it "a way round," "a crooked lane."] notes there. στιβ. = βατα τ. φοινίκων John ver. 13: but this word, by its derivation from $\sigma \tau \epsilon i \beta \omega$, signifies not merely branches, but branches cut for the purpose of being littered to walk on: and thus implies ἐστρώννυον εἰς τ. όδόν, which has been unskilfully supplied. Bp. Wordsw. complains of the introduction of των άγρων into the text, adding "other instances, unhappily far too numerous, might be cited, where corrupt glosses and barbarisms have been recently received as improvements into the Sacred Text." Surely a Commentator of Bp. W.'s learning and piety should know better than to write thus. He well knows, that it is not as improvements, that any such changes have been introduced as those to which he alludes, but simply and humbly in deference to the carefully weighed evidence of the best and oldest authorities, combined with that furnished by the existing phænomena of interpolation and adaptation of parallel places. The charge of attempting to "improve the Sacred Text" recoils on those, who in the face of such evidence, with such questions as "What writer would say, they cut branches off the fields?", shelter their own rationalizing subjectivities under received readings which have been themselves glosses and "improvements" on the Sacred Text. 10.] εὐλ. . . . Δαυείδ, peculiar to Mark, clearly setting forth the idea of the people that the Messianic Kingdom, the restoration of the throne of David, was come. the additional particular of the weeping over the city, Luke vv. 41-44, and notes.

11.] See Matt. ver. 12, and notes on ver. 1: also on John ii. 13-18. I am by no means certain that the solution proposed in the notes on Matt. is the right one, but I cannot suggest a better. When Mark, as here, relates an occurrence throughout, with such signs of an eyewitness as in ver. 4, it is very difficult to suppose that he has transposed any thing; whereas Matt. certainly does not

12-26.] The barren fig-tree. The Cleansing of the Temple. Matt. xxi. 12-22. Our account here bears strong marks of being that of a beholder and hearer: e.g. ἐξελθ. αὐ. ἀπὸ Βηθ...—μακρόθεν,—ἔχουσαν φύλλα,—καὶ ἥκουον οἱ μαθ. αὖτ. The times and order of the events are here more exact than in Matt., who places the withering of the tree immediately after the word spoken by our Lord.

ό γὰρ κ. οὐκ ἦν σ.] The ellipsis may be supplied,—for the season was not (one) of figs,—or, for the season was not

(that) of figs, i.e. not yet the season for figs. The latter suits the context best. The tree was precocious, in being clothed with leaves: and if it had had on it winter figs, which remain on from the autumn, and ripen early the next season, they would have been ripe at this time. But there were none—it was a barren tree. On the import of this miracle, see notes on Matt. 15—19.] Matt. xxi. 12, 13, where see notes: also Luke xix. 45—48.

This was the court of the Gentiles, which was used as a thoroughfare; which desecration our Lord forbade.

tunity to pass of directing attention to the sort of difference, in similarity, between these three reports,—and observing that no origin of that difference is imaginable, except the gradual deflection of accounts from a common, or a parallel, source. See notes on Matt. throughout. 9.] ἐλεύσεται κ.τ.λ. is not the answer of the Pharisees, or of the people, as the corresponding sentence in || Matt. (see note there), but, here and in || Luke, a continuation of our Lord's discourse.

After ver. 11 comes in Matt. vv. 43—45. 12.] Meyer makes o saxos (and o rads in || Luke) the subject to symmax, but I think quite unnecessarily.

The fear of the people is increased by the consciousness on the part of the rulers that He had spoken the parable against them: they are as men convicted before the people.

13—17.] Reply concerning the lawfulness of tribute to Cæsar. Matt. xxii. 15—22. Luke xx. 20—26. The parable of the wedding-garment, Matt. xxii. 1—14, is omitted. The only matters requiring additional remark in these verses are,—13.] $\lambda \delta \gamma \varphi$ is the instrument wherewith they would $\alpha \gamma \rho \epsilon \delta \epsilon \iota \nu$: the verb being one taken from the chase. They wished to lay hold on him by some saying of His.

might be admissible, 'Moses testified, at the bush:' but this will not answer in our text.

28-34. REPLY CONCERNING THE GREAT COMMANDMENT. Matt. xxii. 34-40, but with differing circumstances. There the question appears as that of one among the Pharisees' adherents, who puts this question, πειράζων αὐτόν,—and in consequence of the Pharisees coming up to the strife, after He had discomfited the Sadducees. I should be disposed to take Mark's as the strictly accurate account, seeing that there is nothing in the question which indicates enmity, and our Lord's answer, ver. 34, plainly precludes it. The man, from hearing them disputing, came up, and formed one of the band who gathered together for the purpose of tempting Him. Mark's report, which here is wholly unconnected in origin with Matt.'s, is that of some one who had taken accurate note of the circumstances and character of the man: Matt.'s is more general, not entering, as this, into individual motives, but classing the question broadly among the various "temptations" of our Lord at this time. motive, as shewn by the subordination of ἀκούσας to προςελθών, and of εἰδώς to επηρώτησεν, seems to have been, admiration of our Lord's wise answer, and a desire to be instructed further by Him.

ἐντ. πρώτη πάντ.] This was one of the μάχαι νομικαί (Titus iii. 9),—which was the greatest commandment. The Scribes had many frivolous enumerations and classifications of the commands of the law.

πάντων, not πασῶν: πρώτη-πάντων is treated almost as one word, so that πάντων does not belong to έντ. understood, but, q. d. 'first-of-all of the commandments.' 29 f. Mark cites the passage entire, -Matt. only the command itself :- compare the LXX. In this citation the Vat. reading διανοίας and the Alex. καρδίας are combined: and ἰσχύος = δυνάμεως. "Thou shalt love the Lord with spirit, soul, and body:" with the inner spirit, and the outer life. This is faith working by love: for κ. δ θ. ἡμῶν 30.] ἐσχύς is the language of faith. is the inner spiritual strength of the heart: see Beck's useful little manual, Die biblische Seelenlehre, p. 110. 31.7 Our Lord adds this second, as an application or bringing home of the first. first is the Sun, so to speak, of the spiritual life:-this the lesser light, which reflects the shining of that other. It is like to it, inasmuch as both are laws of love: both deduced from the great and highest love: both dependent on 'I am the Lord thy God,' Levit. xix. 18. Stier sets forth beautifully the strong contrast between the requirements of these two commands, and the then state of the Jewish Church: see John vii. 19. The Scribe shews that he had entered into the true spirit of our Lord's answer; and replies in admiration at its wisdom.

are governed by θελόντων. έσθοντες may either be dependent on the preceding by a broken construction, or may be the beginning of a new sentence of exclamation, as Meyer takes it. The former is to me the more probable, and I have punctuated accordingly. It is a change of construction not without example in the classics: Herod. i. 51, Λακεδαιμονίων φαμένων είναι ανάθεμα, οὐκ ὀρθως λέγοντες. See also reff. The art. points them out graphically. They devoured widows' houses, by attaching them to themselves, and so persuading them to minister to them of their substance. A trace of this practice (but there out of gratitude and love) on the part of the Jewish women, is found in Luke viii. 2, 3. What words can better describe the corrupt practices of the so-called priesthood of Rome, than these of our Lord? The πρόφασις was, to make their sanctity appear to these women, and so win their favour. περισσότερον -

But it is hardly likely that they would be called to γαζ., and we hear of a building by this name in Jos. Antt. xix. 6. 1. Lücke, on John viii. 20, believes some part of the court of the women to be intended, perhaps a chamber in connexion with these chests. So also in ver. 16. Bp. Wordsw. explains the eis, "Ye will be exposed before the eyes of congregations in synagogues, for their pleasure:" and ev our. would mean, "in the buildings, without any reference to the people in them." But how will this apply to δ εἰς τὸν ἀγρὸν τον, ver. 16? Meyer, with Lachmann al., would punctuate after συναγωγάς, and take δαρήσεσθε by itself. This is most improbable, especially when we remember that the synagogues were the places where the scourging was inflicted (see Acts xxii. 19), not to mention the objection to taking the verb thus by itself, which seems to me (against Meyer) alien from the character of the discourse. 11.] Mark has vv. 10, 11 peculiar to himself. de Trin. xii. 3 (it should be i. 12 (23), vol. viii.)). Of such a sense there is not a hint in the context: nay, it is altogether alien from it. The account given by the orthodox Lutherans, as represented by Meyer, that our Lord knew this κατά κτησιν, but not κατά χρησιν, is right enough if at the same time it is carefully remembered, that it was this κτήσις of which He emptied Himself when He became man for us, and which it belongs to the very essence of His mediatorial kingdom to hold in subjection to the Father. 33-37.] Peculiar to Mark, and containing the condensed matter of Matt. vv. 43-47, and perhaps an allusion to the parable of the talents in Matt. xxv.

The θυρωρ. is the door-porter, whose office it would be to look out for approaching travellers, -- answering especially to the ministers of the word, who are (Ezek. xxxiii.) watchmen to God's church.

The construction of ver. 34 is remarkable; the participial clauses being in subordination to $\dot{a}\phi\epsilon is$, and constituting part of the householder's arrangements of departure, and the direct tense being assumed at ἐνετείλατο, as signifying what took place at his very going out of the door, where the porter would be stationed: as if it had been ἀφεὶς τ. οἰκ. αὐτοῦ (καί, &c.) ἐνετείλατο κ.τ.λ.

CHAP. XIV. 1, 2.] CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES AGAINST JESUS. Matt. xxvi. 1-5. Luke xxii. 1, 2. The account of the events preceding the passion in our Gospel takes a middle rank between those of Matt. and Luke. It contains very few words which are not to be found in one or other of them; but at the same time the variations from both are so frequent and irregular, as in my opinion wholly to preclude the idea that Mark had ever seen either. The minute analysis of any passage in the three will, I think, convince an unprejudiced examiner of this.

On the chronological difficulties which beset this part of the Gospel history, see note on Matt. xxvi. 17. 1.] τὸ πάσχα καὶ τὰ ἄζ., classed together, because the time of eating the Passover was actually the commencement of the feast of unleavened bread. Fritzschiorum Opuscula, p. 285. 3-9. THE ANOINTING AT BETHANY. Matt. xxvi. 6-13. John xii. 1-8. (On Luke vii. 36-50, see note there.) whole narrative has remarkable points of similarity with that of John,—and is used by Professor Bleek (Beiträge zur Evangelienkritik, p. 83) as one of the indications that Mark had knowledge of and used the Gospel of John. My own view, as explained in the general Prolegomena, leads me to a different conclusion. have already remarked (note on Matt. xxvi. 3), that while Matt. seems to have preserved trace of the parenthetic nature of this narrative, by his του δε 'I. γενομένου (ver. 6), and τότε πορευθείς (ver. 14),such trace altogether fails in our account. It proceeds as if continuous.

3. νάρδου πιστικής It seems impossible to assign any certain, or even probable meaning, to πιστικής (a word found here and in John's narrative only). The Vulg. and the lat. mss. c ff q render it "spicati." The ancient Commentators give us nothing but conjecture. Euthymius and Theophylact interpret it "genuine:" катаπεπιστευμένην είς καθαρότητα, Euth.; άδολον καὶ μετὰ πίστεως κατασκευασθεῖσαν, Theophyl.; 'veram et absque dolo,' Jerome. Augustine supposes it to refer to some place from which the nard came. Origen's comment on the passage is lost. The expression no where occurs in the classics, nor in Clement of Alex., who gives a long account (Pædagog. ii. 8, pp. 76-79 P) of ointments. The word can therefore hardly signify any particular kind of ointment technically so called.

The modern interpretations of the word are principally of two kinds: the first, agreeing with Euth. and Theophyl., 'genuine,' 'unadulterated;' which sense however of the word does not any where else occur. It is used transitively for πειστικός, ' persuasive,' by Aristotle (Rhet. i. 2), and in some later writers for πιστός, as δ πιστικώτατος των θεραπόντων, Cedrenus, Annal., cited by Lücke on John xii. 3. Euseb. also uses the word (Demonstr. Evang. ix. vol. iv. p. 684, ed. Migne), but in the sense of 'pertaining to the faith,' as his Latin translator renders it, or, as Lücke thinks, perhaps 'potable,' as a derivative of $\pi \iota \sigma \tau \delta s$ (from $\pi \iota \nu \omega$). This brings us to the second modern interpretation, which makes πιστικός 'liquid,' 'potable,' and derives it as above. There certainly was a kind of ointment which they drank; for Athenaus (xv. 39, p. 689) quotes from Hicesius, των μύρων & μέν έστι χρίματα, & δ' ἀλείμματα. καὶ ρόδινον μεν πρὸς πότον ἐπιτήδειον, ἔτι δε μύρσινον, μήλινων τοῦτο δέ έστι καὶ εὐστόμαχον καὶ ληθαργικοῖς χρήσιμου . . . καὶ ἡ στακτὴ δ' ἐπιτήδειος πρὸς πότον, ἔτι δὲ νάρδος. The only objection to this interpretation is, that the word is no where foundwhich however is not so decisive as in the last case, for, as πιστικός from πιστός, 'faithful,' so there might be πιστικός from πιστός, 'potable'—and from being a term confined to dealers in ointments, it might have escaped notice elsewhere.

(from whom the substance of this note is derived) seems to incline to Augustine's conjecture (see above): but then surely the name would be more common, as 'balm of Gilead,' &c. The uncertainty being so great, the best rendering would be to leave the word untranslated, as Jer. Taylor does in his "Life of Christ" (sect. 15): 'Nard Pistick.' Bp. Wordsw. sees in the word the mystical sense, that "offerings to Christ should be . . . the fruits of a lively and loving mioris, or faith, in συντρ. την άλάβ. can hardly mean only having broken the resin with which the cork was sealed. In ch. v. 4: John xix. 36: Rev. ii. 27, the word is used of breaking, properly so called: and

I see no objection to supposing that the $\lambda\lambda\delta\beta\alpha\sigma\tau\rho\rho\sigma$ was crushed in the hand, and the ointment thus poured over His head. The feet would then (John xii. 3) be anointed with what remained on the hands of Mary, or in the broken vase (see note on Luke vii. 38).

idea that Mark compiled his account from the other two. In these words there appears to be a reproach conveyed to Judas, and perhaps an allusion to the office of giving to the poor being his. We have here again a striking addition peculiar to Mark- ο ἔσχεν ἐποίησενshe did what she could: a similar praise to that given to the poor widow, ch. xii. 44-πάντα ὅσα εἶχεν ἔβαλεν. We have also the expression προέλαβεν μυρίσαι, shewing, as I have observed on Matt., that the act was one of prospective love, grounded on the deepest apprehension of the reality of our Lord's announcement of His approaching death. 9.] See notes on Matt. ver. 13.

10, 11.] COMPACT OF JUDAS WITH THE CHIEF PRIESTS TO BETRAY HIM. Matt. xxvi.14-16. Luke xxii.3-6. The only matters requiring notice are,-the elliptical aκούσαντες,—'hearing the proposal,' -and ἐπηγγείλαντο, implying, as does συνέθεντο in Luke, that the money was not paid now, either as full wages or as carnest-money, -but promised; and paid (most probably) when the Lord was brought before the Sanhedrim, which was what Judas undertook to do. The δ before els is untranslatable in English: 'that one of the twelve' is too strongly demonstrative: and yet & is demonstrative, and expresses much.

12-16. PREPARATION FOR CELE-BRATING THE PASSOVER. Matt. xxvi. 17 -19. Luke xxii. 7-13. Our account contains little that is peculiar. ὅτε τὸ π. ἔθυον, like Luke's expression ή έδει θύεσθαι τὸ π., denotes the ordinary day, when they (i. e. the Jews) sacrificed the Passover ;- for that the Lord ate His Passover on that day, and at the usual time, is the impression conveyed by the testimony of the three Evangelists: see notes on Matt. ver. 17, and Luke ver. 7.

We may notice that if this Gospel, as traditionally reported, was drawn up under the superintendence of Peter, we could hardly have failed to have the names of the two disciples given; -nor again would our narrator have missed (and the omission is an important one) the fact that the Lord first gave the command, to go and prepare the Passover—which Luke

It becomes a duty to warn only relates. students of the sacred word against fanciful interpretations. A respected Commentator of our own day explains the pitcher of water, which led the way to the room where the last Supper was celebrated, to mean "the baptismal grace" which we have "in earthen vessels," which "leads on to other graces, even to the Communion of Christ's Body and Blood." In the midst of a verbal accordance with Luke we have here inserted ετοιμον, indicating that the guest-chamber was already prepared for the celebration of the Passover, as would indeed be probable at this time in Jerusalem. The disciples had therefore only to get ready the Passover itself.

17-21.7 JESUS, CELEBRATING THE PASSOVER, ANNOUNCES HIS BETRAYAL BY ONE OF THE TWELVE. Matt. xxvi. 20 -25. Luke xxii. 14 (21-23). John xiii. 21 ff. The account of Luke (ver. 16) supplies the important saying of our Lord respecting the fulfilment of the two parts of the Passover feast—see notes there. After our ver. 17, comes in the washing of the disciples' feet by the Lord, as related in John xiii. 1—20. 18.] The words ὁ ἐσθίων μετ' ἐμοῦ are peculiar to Mark, and, as we have seen before, bear a relation to John's account, where our Lord had just before cited δ τρώγων κ.τ.λ., ver. 18. The andos following is used as if not els κατά είς but only είς had been used. Meyer remarks that such broken construction is suitable to the graphic tendency of our Evangelist. 20. This description of the traitor here again does not seem to designate one especially, nor to describe an action at that moment proceeding, but, as before, pathetically to describe the near relation of the betrayer to the Betrayed. Now however the relation pointed out is still closer than before -it is that of one dipping in the same dish-one of those nearest and most trusted.

repeating superabundantly: the ἐλάλει giving Peter's continued and excessive iteration, the exeyov following expressing merely the one, or, at all events, less frequent saying of the same by the rest. The reading ἔλεγεν has apparently been a correction, haheiv signifying to speak and not to say, and its peculiar fitness here being missed. ού μή with fut. indic. makes the certainty of the assertion doubly sure. The E.V. attempts to represent this by adding "in any wise." We sometimes give the same effect by substituting the objective future for the subjective, "I never shall deny thee."

perfect without the augment, see Winer, σύσσημον is a word belonging to later Greek. We have in Diod. Sic. xx. 42, ήρε το συγκείμενον προς μάχην σύσσημον, ασπίδα κεχρυσωμένην. See other examples in Kypke.

ἀπάγετε ἀσφαλῶς] It does not quite appear whether aopahûs is to be subjectively taken, 'with confidence;' or objectively, 'safely.' Some suppose that it has an ironical meaning-q.d. 'He will know how to rescue himself-take care that you keep Him safe.' This of course depends upon the view taken of the whole character and purpose of Judas, on which see notes at Matt. xxvi. 14 and xxvii. 3. ραββεί appears to have been the usual form in which Judas addressed our Lord-see Matt. xxvi. 25. But we must not conclude from this with Bengel, that he never seems to have called Him Lord: see Matt. 51.7 It is impossible to determine, and therefore idle to enquire, who this was. Epiphanius, Hær. lxxviii. 13, vol. i. (ii., Migne) p. 1045, in recounting the traditional austerities of James the brother of the Lord, says, &s xιτώνιον δεύτερον οὐκ ἐνεδύσατο δι τριβωνίφ ἐκέ-

It seems to have been some attached disciple of the Lord (probably well known to the readers of Mark), who had gone to rest, and had been aroused by the intelligence. The disciples were not laid hold of:-this person perhaps was throwing some obstacle in the way of the removal of Jesus: or he may have been laid hold of merely in wantonness, from his unusual garb. Yupvou does not require σώματος to be supplied, but γυμνόν is a neuter substantive: see on this usage generally Kühner, Gramm. ii. p. 118.

53-65.] HEARING BEFORE CAIAPHAS. Matt. xxvi. 57—68. (Luke xxii. 54, 63—65.) John xviii. 24. See throughout notes 53. apxiepéa Caiaphas, on Matt. de facto, and in the view of our narrator; -so Matt. and Luke: but Jesus was first taken before Annas, who was de jure the high-priest: see John xviii. 12-23. It is not easy to interpret συνέρχονται αὐτῷ. Meyer, relying on the fact that the dative after συνέρχεσθαι is always one of companionship, maintains that αὐτῷ refers to our Lord—'there come with him.' And so Winer, ed. 6, § 31. 5 ad fin. But surely this is very precarious. For 1) St. Mark uses this verb once only besides here, and then absolutely. And there could be no difficulty in taking it thus here and applying αὐτῷ to the High-priest as a dative of direction. And 2) could it be said of one whom they απήγαγον, that he έρχεται to the High-priest? I venture therefore to prefer the usual construction of the words, 'there come to-gether to him.' The E. V. has 'with him were assembled;' and so Winer in former editions of his Grammar. usage of dos for a fire is found in Xen. Cyr. vii. 5. 27, οί δ' ἐπὶ τοὺς φύλακας

Some have imagined (De Wette, Meyer) that they find in these words xeipow. and axeip. traces of later Christian tradition, and an allusion to Heb. ix. 11: Acts vii. 48; but such conjectures are at best very unsafe, and the words are quite as likely to have been uttered by the Lord as they here stand. The allusion is probably to Dan. ii. 34.

The reading $\partial \Delta \partial \partial v$ is harsh in sense, but the coincidence of $\partial \Delta \mu \beta a \nu v$ in DG al. seems to stamp it with genuineness. The meaning must be 'took Him in hand with,' treated Him with.' Meyer understands it, took Him into custody, with..., for the further carrying out of the sentence against Him. But the unemphatic position of the verb seems to preclude this.

Hammond and Palairet supply τοὺs ὀφθαλμοὺς τῷ Ἰησοῦ—but besides this being most fanciful, the fact was not so: see Luke ver. 61. 2) The vulgate, Syr., Euth., Thl.², Luth., Kuin., take ἐπιβαλὼν έκλαιεν for ἐπέβαλεν κλαίειν, 'he began to weep.' But granting that this is a later meaning of the word (Kuin. cites ἐπέβαλε τερετίζειν, cantillare coepit, Diog. xi. 4, which Kuin. cites to support it, has quite another meaning-see note there. 3) Grot., Le Clerc, al. render it 'addens flevit'-i. e. he continued weeping (so ἐπιβαλών έρωταν Theophr. Char. 8. έπιβαλών φησι Diod. Sic. p. 345 B); -but then his beginning to weep would have been noticed before. Grot. wants to give it the sense of 'præterea.' 4) Beza, Raphel, Bretschu., Wahl, al. say, 'quum se foras projecisset;' but although ἐπιβάλλειν τινί or ἐπί τι may mean 'to rush upon' (see 1 Macc. iv. 2), it cannot stand alone in this meaning. The chief support of this sense is the έξελθών έξω of Matt. and Luke: but this cannot decide the matter. 5) Thl. al. supply τὸ ἱμάτιον τῆ κεφαλῆ, 'casting or drawing his mantle over his head;' but this, without any precedent for such an ellipsis, although it suits the sense very well, appears fanciful. 6) Wetst. al. take it for 'attendere,' and some supply $\tau \hat{\eta}$ άλεκτοροφωνία, others τῶ ρήματι: Wetst. and Kypke have however shewn that the word is used absolutely in this sense, in Polyb. and other late writers. One example given by Kypke is much to the point: ά del μεν γινώσκει, άλλως δε και άλλως έπιβάλλει, και μαλλόν έστιν ότε και ήττον, semper quidem cognoscit, sed diversis modis res animadvertit, imo magis interdum et minus:' Hierocl. in carm. Pythag. p. 14. The above list is taken mainly The above list is taken manny from De Wette (Exeg. Handb. p. 247), who while preferring this last sense, yet thinks that it was before expressed in $\partial \nu \epsilon \mu \nu \eta \sigma \partial \eta$. But $\partial \mu \nu \partial \nu \partial \nu$ contains more than $\partial \nu \epsilon \mu \nu \nu$: that was the bare momentary remembrance—the βημα occurred to him;

—this is the thinking, or, as we sometimes say, casting it over; going back step by step through the sad history. This sense, though not wholly satisfactory, appears to me the best. In ekhalev. Bp. Wordsw. well points out the imperf. "wept, and continued weeping: something more than έκλαυσε."

There is a Rufus saluted Rom. xvi. 13. The words ἐρχόμ. ἀπ' ἀγρ. determine nothing as to its being a working day or otherwise, any more than οἱ παραπορευ-όμενοι, Matt. ver. 39: nothing is said as to the distance from whence he came.

and Luke, but, as now standing unexplained, inconsistent with John, xix. 14, where it is said to have been about the sixth hour at the time of the exhibition of our Lord by Pilate. I own I see no satisfactory way of reconciling these accounts, unless there has been (see note on John) some very early erratum in our copies, or unless it can be shewn from other grounds than the difficulty before us, that John's reckoning of time differs from that employed in the other Evangelists. The difficulty is of a kind in no way affecting the authenticity of the narrative, nor the truthfulness of each Evangelist; but requires some solution to the furnishing of which we are not competent. It is preposterous to imagine that two such accounts as these of the proceedings of so eventful a day should differ by three whole hours in their apportionment of its occurrences. So that it may fairly be presumed, that some different method of calculation has given rise to the present discrepancy. Meanwhile the chronology of our text, -as being carried on through the day, and as allowing time both for the trial, and the events of the crucifixion, -is that inconsistency, or but a very trifling one, with the order in John, ver. 31, to break their legs and take them down. The circumstances related there had taken place, but no report of them had been made to Pilate. And the Body of the Lord had not been taken down, for some reason which does not appear, but which we can easily guess;—if Joseph had declared to the soldiers his intention of begging the Body, nay, had immediately gone (perhaps with them) to Pilate for that purpose,-and τολμήσας εἰςηλθ. looks like a sudden and unannounced application,-they would have left the Body for him to take down.

έθαύμασεν εί ήδη τέθνηκεν-he wondered at the fact thus announced to him of His death having already taken place. See Kühner, Gram. ii. p. 481, and the examples there adduced, which make this clear, e.g. Demosth. p. 24. 23, -θαυμάζω, εὶ Λακεδαιμονίοις μέν πότε . . . αντήρατε, νυνὶ δ' ὀκνεῖτε... 45. ἐδω-ρήσατο] The passage cited (Meyer, De Wette) from Cicero (in Verrem, v. 45) to shew that it was customary to give money on such occasions, is not to the point; 'mortis celeritatem pretio redimere cogebantur parentes' is not said of the body after death, but of a fee given to the officer, 'ne diu crucietur.' 46. άγορ. Therefore it was not the first day of unleavened bread, which was one of sabbatical sanctity; as indeed the whole of this narrative shews, but such expressions as this more strikingly. καθαιρείν is the technical word for taking down bodies from the cross. See the examples in Kypke from Philo and Josephus. So is κατατιθέναι for placing bodies in the tomb: èν μνημ.] It is not said, but implied, both here and in Luke and John, that the tomb was his own-for how should he place the Body there otherwise? The newness of the tomb is not mentioned here, but by the other three Evangelists. 47.] M. ή Ἰωσῆτος—understand, mother: see ver. 40. That she is so called here, and Μαρία ή τοῦ 'laκώβου in the next verse, points to a difference of origin in the two accounts here, of the Crucifixion and Resurrection.

The mother of the Lord had in all probability previously departed: see notes on Matt. xxvii. 56 and John xix. 27.

Luke generalizes, and says, the women who came with Him from Galilee.

Some have understood by M. 'Iwσήτος or 'Ιωσή or 'Ιωσήφ, the wife or daughter of Joseph of Arimathæa-some, the mother of the Lord: but both unnecessarily, and without proof. The perf. τεθείται is to shew that they came up after the burial had taken place; the pres. (τίθεται, rec) would imply that they were present at the entombment. So Meyer.

1. διαγ. τ. σαβ.] It was strictly when the Sabbath was ended, i.e. at sunset, that they bought the spices. Luke xxiii.

55, places it on the evening before the Sabbath; a slight but valuable discrepancy, as shewing the independence of the accounts. To suppose two parties of women (Greswell) or to take ηγόρασαν as pluperfect (Beza, Grotius, &c.) is equally arbitrary and unwarranted. This had not been done as yet. Nicodemus (John xix. 40) had only wrapped the Body hurriedly in the spices with the 2. ἀνατείλαντος τ. linen clothes. ήλ. The reading of D, $\grave{\alpha}\nu\alpha\tau\acute{\epsilon}\lambda$ λοντος, would not help us much, as it was evidently some time before sunrise. Even Greswell virtually acknowledges a difficulty here.

3, 4.] It had been rolled away by an angel, Matt. γὰρ μέγ. σφ. is stated as a reason why they could see that it was rolled away on . looking up, possibly at some distance. Here he is described as he appeared, and we are left to infer what he was. In Luke,—two angels ἐπέστησαν avrais in the tomb. The incident to which these accounts point, must be distinct from that related John xx. 11, which was after Mary Magdalene returned from the city. It is not worth while to detail the attempts which have been made to reconcile these various reports of the incident: they present curious examples of the ingenuity, and (probably unconscious) disingenuousness, of the Harmonists. I may mention that Greswell supposes the angels in Matt. and Mark to be distinct, and accounts for the έξεθαμβήθησαν in our text thus: 'After seeing one angel without already, they were probably less prepared than before to see another so soon after within' (Dissert. vol. iii. p. 187).

6.] From the δεῦτε of Matt. I should be inclined to think that his is the strictly accurate account. The mention of him here is probably merely official-as the 'primus inter pares.' We cannot say that others of the Apostles may not have denied their Master besides Peter. It must not be concluded from this that we have a trace of Peter's hand in the 8.] The idea of our narrative here is, that the women fled in terror from the sepulchre, and did not deliver the message at the time,—for they

(3) In ALUΓΔ alm, am fuld ing2, the numbers of Eus and Ammon are not attached beyond ver. 8. In many mss the passage is insd with an asterisk.

(4) Clem-rom, Just, Clem-alex take no notice of it. Eus states that it is wanted in many mss: ἐν τοὐτω (ἐφοβ. γάρ) σχεδὸν ἐν ἄπασι τοῖς ἀντιγράφοις τοῦ κατὰ μάρκον εὐαγγελίου περιγέγραπται τὸ τέλος, and he calls these τὰ ἀκριβῆ τῶν ἀντιγράφων—Ad Marin. Quæst. 1, vol. iv. See the whole quoted in Davidson's Introd. i. 164. Sev, Vict, Greg-nyss(or Hesych of Jerus), Jer(ad Hedib. 3, vol. i. p. 825, omnes Graeciae libros paene hoc capitulum in fine non habere), Euthym say that it is wanting in the greater number, or, in the more accurate.

III. It would thus appear that while the passage was appended as early as the time of Irenœus, it was still absent from the majority of codices as late as Jerome's day. The legitimate inference is that it was placed as a completion of the Gospel soon after the apostolic period,—the Gospel itself having been, for some reason unknown to us, left incomplete. The most probable supposition is, that the last leaf of the original Gospel was torn away.

IV. The attempt to account for its absence by the hypothesis that it was erased by reason of its inconsistency with the accounts in the other Gospels, is quite futile. We have no instances of erasure of portions of the Gospels for any such reason: nor do the fathers who mention the inconsistency (Greg-nyss, Vict, Sev, Jer), allege such erasure to have been made: nor, had it been made, need it have included the whole passage. The inconsistency itself is a valuable testimony to the antiquity of the fragment, as having been composed from independent testimony, and not from the other Gospels.

V. The internal evidence, which is discussed in the notes, will be found to preponderate vastly against the authorship of Mark.

there can be no doubt that it will be made good in our own or any other time. But we must remember that σημεῖα are not needed where Christianity is professed: nor by missionaries who are backed by the influence of powerful Christian nations. There are credible testimonies of miraculous powers having been exercised in the Church considerably after the Apostles' time.

Saim. ἐκβ.] The Lord Himself has declared how weighty a sign this was, Matt. xii. 28. For fulfiments of the promise, see Acts v. 16; viii. 7; xvi. 18.

18. δφ. ἀρ.] See Acts xxviii. 3—5. κᾶν θαν. . . . βλάψη] We have no instance of this given in the Acts: but later, there are several stories which, if to be relied on, furnish examples of its fulfilment. Eusebius, H. E. iii. 39, says, . . . ἔτερον παράδοξον περὶ Ἰοῦστον τὸν ἐπικληθέντα Βαραβᾶν γεγονός, ὡς δηλητήριον φάρμακον ἐμπιόντος καὶ μηδὲν ἀηδὲς διὰ τὴν τοῦ κυρίου χάριν ὑπομείναντος. ἐπὶ ἀρὲ.] χεῖρας ἐπιθ. ἐπί τινα is in Mark's manner: see ch. viii. 25; x. 16. There is no mention of the anointing with oil here, as in James v. 14. 19, 20.] The μὲν οὖν is not to be taken here as if there were no δέ following:—the μέν answers to the δέ as in Luke iii. 18, 19—and the οὖν is the connecting link with what went before.

μὲν οὖν, ὁ κύριος, and ὁ κύριος Ἰησοῦς, are alike foreign to the diction of Mark, in speaking of the Lord: we have ὁ κύριος in the message (common to all three Gospels) ch. xi. 3—but that manifestly is no example. μετὰ τὸ λαλ. can only in fairness mean, 'when He had spoken these words.' All endeavours of the Harmonists to include in them οὐ μόνον τοὺς λόγους τούτους, ἀλλὰ πάντας ὕσους ἐλάλησε (Euthym.) will have no weight with an honest reader, who looks to the evident sense of his author alone, and disregards other considerations. That other words were spoken, we know; but that this author intended us to infer that, surely is not deducible from the text, and is too often allowed in such cases to creep fallaciously in as an inference. We never shall read or comment on Scripture with full profit, till all such subterfuges are abandoned, and the gospel evidence treated in the clear light of intelligent and honest faith. We have an example of this last in Theophylact's exposition, ταῦτα δὲ λαλήσας. ἀνελ.] I should hardly say that the author of this fragment necessarily implies an ascension from the place where they were then assembled. The whole of these two verses is of a compendious character, and as ἐκάθ. ἐκ δ. τ. θ. must be understood as setting forth a fact not comprehended in the cycle of their observation, but certain in the belief of all Christians, so ἀνελήμφ. may very well speak of the fact as happening, not necessarily then and there, but (see remarks above) after these words were spoken; provided always that these words are recognized as the last in the view and information of our Evangelist. I say this not with any harmonistic view, but hecause the words themselves seem to require it. (See on the Ascension, notes on Luke xxiv. 51 ff.) 20.] ἐξελθόντες not, from the chamber where they were assembled (Meyer)-which would not answer to ἐκήρυξαν πανταχοῦ, but would require some immediate action of that

A few concluding remarks may be added respecting vv. 9-20. (1) For the external evidence, see var. readd. As to its genuineness as a work of the Evangelist Mark, (2) internal evidence is, I think, very weighty against Mark's being the author. No less than twenty-one words and expressions occur in it (and some of them several times), which are never elsewhere used by Mark,-whose adherence to his own peculiar phrases is remarkable. (3) The inference therefore seems to me to be, that it is an authentic fragment, placed as a completion of the Gospel in very early times: by whom written, must of course remain wholly uncertain; but coming to us with very weighty sanction, and having strong claims on our reception and reverence.]

CHAP. I. 1-4.7 PREFACE TO THEO-PHILUS. The peculiar style of this preface, -which is purer Greek than the contents of the Gospel, and also more laboured and formal,-may be accounted for, partly because it is the composition of the Evangelist himself, and not translated from Hebrew sources like the rest, and partly because prefaces, especially when also dedicatory, are usually in a rounded and artificial style. 1. ἐπειδήπερ] This compound, of rare occurrence, is in keeping with the rhetorical style of the preface. See Hartung, Partikellehre, i. p. Valcknaer quotes from Ulpian a similar exordium: ἐπειδήπερ περί τούτου πολλοί ἐπεχείρησαν ἀπολογήσασθαι.

πολλοί] Much depends on the meaning of this word, as guiding, or modifying, our opinion on the relation and sources of our Gospel histories. (1) That the writers of our present Gospels exclusively cannot be meant, is evident; since, even supposing Luke to have seen all three Gospels, one (that of John) was wholly, and another (that of Matthew) was in greater part, the production of an eye-witness and minister of the word,—which would leave only one for the πολλοί. (2) Apocryphal Gospels exclusively cannot be meant: for they would not be 'narrations concerning matters fully believed among us,' nor 'delivered by eye-witnesses and ministers of the word,' a great part of their contents being excluded by this very author from his own διήγησις. (3) A combination of these two may be intended—e. g. of the latter sort, the Gospel according to the Hebrews,-of the former, that according to Mark, but then also how shall we make out the πολλοί? Our present apocryphal Gospels arose far later than any likely date which can be assigned to Luke's Gospel: see Prolegomena to Luke, § iv. (4) I believe the only probable interpretation of the words to be, that many persons, in charge of Churches, or otherwise induced, drew up, here and there, statements (narratives, διηγ.) of the testimony of eye-witnesses and ύπηρ. τ. λ. (see below), so far as they themselves had been able to collect them. (I do not believe that either the Gospel of Matt. or that of Mark are to be reckoned among these; or if they are, that Luke had seen or used them.) That such narratives should not have come down to us, is no matter of surprise: for (1) they would be absorbed by the more complete and sanctioned accounts of our present Evangelists; and (2) Church tradition has preserved very few fragments of authentic information of the apostolic age. It is probable that in almost every Church where an eye-witness preached, his testimony would be taken down, and framed into some διήγησις, more or less complete, of the life and sayings of the Lord. έπεχείρησαν have undertaken; or, as E. V., taken in hand. This does not necessarily imply the insufficiency of such διηγήσεις, as Orig., Ambr., Theophyl., &c. have imagined. Nor is any such failure implied (as Bp. Wordsw.) in Acts xix. 13, where the aorist also is used. The failure then was not in the ovoud(eiv, but in the issue. In Acts ix. 29, the failure is conveyed by the imperfect tense, not necessarily by the verb itself. The fact of that failure is indeed implied in Luke's description of his own work-but that, more because it possessed completeness (whereas they were fragmentary) than from any difference in kind. ἀνατάξασθαι] to draw upto arrange. διήγ. a setting forth: and so if in relation to things past, a narration - history. The word is clearly explained in Plato, Rep. iii. p. 392 : ἀρ' οὐ πάντα όσα ύπο μυθολόγων ή ποιητών λέγεται, διήγησις οὖσα τυγχάνει ή γεγονότων ή όντων ή μελλόντων: Τί γάρ, έφη, ἄλλο; Αρα οὖν οὐχὶ ήτοι ἀπλῆ διηγήσει ή διὰ μιμήσεως γιγνομένη ή δι' αμφοτέρων περαίνουσιν: πεπληρ., according to some, 'fulfilled.' De Wette supports this by the meaning of πληρόω Acts xix. 21; xii. 25, which is beside the purpose. The more likely rendering is that of E. V., certainly believed. (Meyer would render it, 'which have found their completion among us,' i. e. 'us of the apostolic times;' meaning 'Theophilus and himself,' &c. This, I think, gives too emphatic a sense to ev huiv, which can only mean as ordinarily, 'among us,' unless accompanied with some qualifying expression. His objection to the ordinary explanation,-that the participle ought, according to it, to be subjective to the πράγματα, surely is of no force.) See reff. and note on 2 Tim. iv. 5, 17. use of the cognate noun πληροφορία supports this view: see 1 Thess. i. 5: Heb. vi. 11. There does not appear to be any reference to the filling of the sails of a ship, as Bp. Wordsw. The word with its cognates occurs only in a figurative sense, derived from "filling full" without any special reference. hulv among us Christians, i. e. you and me, and all members of the Church of Christ-so also the ήμῖν in ver. 2. 2. καθὼς παρ.] Το Apostles, &c., delivered these matters orally to the Churches in their teaching 2. καθώς παρ. Το (see below on karnx.) and others drew up accounts from that catechetical instruction. It appears from this, that Luke was not aware of any διήγησις drawn up by an eye-witness or ὑπ. τ. λ. Their account of these matters was a παράδοσις, from which the διηγήσεις were drawn up. He cannot therefore have seen (or, having seen, not recognized as such, which is highly improbable) the Gospel of Matthew. Compare 1 John i. 1-3. ἀπ' ἀρχηςnot, 'from the very beginning,' i.e. the birth of the Lord, &c., but from the official beginning: see Acts i. 21 f. It differs from avwber below. αύτ. κ. ύπηρ. τοῦ λ.] αὖτ. most probably stands alone: but it may well be taken with τ . λ . Bleek, in his posthumous "Erklärung der drei ersten Evv.," Leipz. 1862, also objects to the personal sense as too precise and definite for the rhetorical generalities of St. Luke in this passage)-nor 'the matter,' so that ὑπ. τ. λ. would signify those who by their labours contributed to bring the matter about, 'qui ipsi interfuerunt rebus, tanquam pars aliqua'-for this is alien from Luke's usage of ὑπηρ.—see Acts xxvi. 16; but, the word,—'the word preached:'—so that $\delta \pi \eta \rho \epsilon \tau \eta s \tau$. $\lambda \delta \gamma$. διάκονος τ. λόγ. kauol Luke by this classes himself with these moddol, and shews that he intended no disparagement nor blame to them, and was going to construct his own history from similar sources. The παρηκ. άν. πᾶσιν ἀκρ. which follows, implies however a conscious superiority of his own qualification for the work. There is here no expressed claim to inspiration, but at the same time no disclaimer of it. (The addition et spiritui sancto, after κάμοί, which is found in 3 lat. mss. and in goth., makes the following clause an absurdity.)

παρηκ. having traced down (by research), and so become accurately acquainted with. He traced the events in order as they happened: but he may have arranged them as other considerations led him. The word is of later usage, e.g. by Plutarch, Ælian, &c. The classics have ἐφεξης.

κράτ. Θεόφ. It is wholly unknown who this person was. The name was a very common one. The conjectures about him are endless, and entirely without value. It appears that he was a person of dignity (see reff. on κράτιστ.), and a convert to Christianity. The idea of the name being not a proper, but a feigned one, designating 'those who loved God' (found as early as Epiphanius, Hær. ii. 51, p. 429, είτουν τινί Θεοφίλω τότε γράφων τούτο έλεγεν, ή παντί ανθρώπω θεδν άγαπῶντι: and adopted again recently by Bp. Wordsworth), is far-fetched and im-4.] ἐπιγνῶς—here in its stricter sense, of acquiring additional, more accurate knowledge-see reff.

κατηχ. Theophilus had then been orally instructed in the narratives which form the subject of this Gospel: and Luke's intention in writing it is, that he might have a more accurate knowledge of these histories. κατηχήθης — literally, cate-chized, 'catechetically taught.' Bleek, h. l., reminds us that this is not St. Luke's own usage of the verb: cf. Acts xxi. 21, 24, where it simply signifies hearing by report. But we may answer that in Acts xviii. 25, where the same construction occurs, this is the most likely sense.

λόγων is not to be rendered 'things:' neither it, nor βημα, nor τες, ever has this meaning, as is commonly but erroneously supposed. In all the commonly-cited examples of this, 'things expressed in words' are meant: here, the histories, -accounts. (See Prolegg. to the Gospels, i. 3.)

In the phrase έντολαῖς κ. δικαιώμασιν (see reff.), we must not press any difference between the terms. δικαίωμα, as Bleek remarks, is used of an ordinance of God, laying down what 7.] προβαίνειν is is δίκαιον for men. only found in the classics in this sense with τήν or κατά την ηλικίαν, or τη ηλικία.

9, 10. τοῦ θυμιᾶσαι (not θυμιάσαι)] This was the most honourable office which was allotted among the priests each day, and the same person could not serve it more than once. On the manner of casting the lots, see Lightfoot in loc.

τοῦ θ. εἰςελθών = to go in and to burn incense. The gen. τοῦ is in government after the verb ἔλαχεν: see Winer, § 44. 4. a. This verb commonly governs an accusative, but now and then a genitive: see Kühner, § 521: and cf. Il. ω. 76.

Here also we have the people outside (in the courts of the men and women): -their prayers were offered while the incense was burnt, as the smoke was symbolical of the ascent of prayer, Rev. viii. It appears, from the allotment having been just mentioned, to have been the morning incense burning. So Meyer. Theophylact and others understand the whole as describing the entry into the Holy of holies on the great day of Atonement, Levit. xvi. But this is manifestly an error: for it would necessitate Zacharias having been high-priest, which he never was; and in this case there would have been no casting of lots. 11.7 The altar of incense, Exod. xxx. 1, must not be confounded with the large altar of burnt-offering: that stood outside the holy place, in the court of the priests. It was during the sacrifice on the great altar that the daily burning of the incense took place: one of the two priests, whose lot it was to offer incense, brought fire from off the altar of burnt-offering to the altar of incense, and then left the other priest there alone, -who, on a signal from the priest presiding at the sacrifice, kindled the in-This is no cense: see Exod. xl. 5, 26. vision, but an actual angelic appearance. The right is the favourable side: see Matt. xxv. 33. "We must understand the right as regarded the officiating priest, who stood with his face to the altar. It would thus be on the N. side of the holy place, where the table of shew-brend stood, whereas on the S. side was the golden candlestick." Bleek.

13. He had then prayed for a son -but as appears below, long since-for he now had ceased to look for an answer to his prayer. Many Commentators (Aug., Thl., Euth., Grot., &c.) have thought his prayer was for the salvation of Israel by the appearance of the Messiah: but the former view appears more probable.

The priests were similarly prohibited to drink strong drink; and the Nazarites even more rigidly: see σίκ. = חשֵיה (from מַבָּר, 'inebriatus est'),—'any strong liquor not made from grapes.' [Wiclif renders "He schal not drynke wyne ne sidir."]

πν. άγ. πλ. is a contrast to, and a reason for, the not drinking wine nor strong drink: compare Eph. v. 18.

Olshausen and Meyer think that (comparing ver. 44) the meaning is, the Holy Spirit should in some wonderful manner act on the child even before his birth. But (see reff.) this is not necessary,

-nay, would it not rather be in this case εν κοιλία . . . ? The εκ seems to fix the prior limit of the indwelling of the Spirit, at his birth. Meyer grounds his view on the meaning of ETL as distinguished from ήδη, and takes the construction as embracing both particulars—he shall be so in, and shall become so from . . . So likewise Bleek, and Hoffmann, Weiss. und 16. The work of Erfüll. ii. 250 f. John was one of preparation and turning men's hearts towards God. For full notes on his office, see on Matt. xi. It may suffice here to repeat, that it was a concentration of the spirit of the law, whose office it was to convince of sin: and that he eminently represented the law and the prophets in their work of preparing the way for Christ. 17.] ἐνώπ. αὐτοῦ.... i.e. κυρίου τοῦ θ. αὐτῶν, manifest in the flesh. De Wette denies this interpretation, as contrary to all analogy: and yet himself explains the expression by saying that what the Messiah does, is in Scripture ascribed to God as its doer (similarly Meyer). But why? because Messiah is This expression is be-GOD WITH US. sides used (see Zech. xiv. 5) in places where the undoubted and sole reference is to the Messiah. See Bleek's note, in which he decides for this view, as against that which refers advov directly to the Messiah as the Son of God. Suv.] As a type, a partial fulfilment, of the personal coming of Elias in the latter days (see note on Matt. xi. 13, 14). Bleek remarks that it was not in the wonderworking agency of Elias that John was like him, for "John did no miracle,"-but in the power of his uttered persuasion.

ἀπειθής, as in reff., not unbelieving, but disobedient. On the verb ἀπειθείν, see note, Heb. iii. 18, and on ἀπείθεια, note, Eph. ii. 2. ἐν is elliptic for εἰς τὸ εἶναι ἐν . . . see reff. Augustine, De Civ. Dei, xx. 29, vol. vii .- 'est sensus, ut etiam filii sic intelligant legem, id est, Judæi, quemadmodum patres eam intellexerunt, id est Prophetæ, in quibus erat et ipse Moyses: so also Kuinoel, but erroneously, for both articles would be expressed,— τῶν πατέρων ἐπὶ τὰ τέκνα. The birth of John, involving human generation, but prophetically announced, and supernatural, answers to the birth of Isaac in the O.T. But Abraham's faith was a strong contrast to the unbelief of Zacharias: see Rom. iv. 19. De Wette, without noticing the above remark (which is Olshausen's), says, "the same doubt, which Abraham also entertained in a similar case;" so that we have here, as often elsewhere, in the interpretation of Scripture (Gen. xv. 6, 8; xvii. 17; xviii. 12), De Wette versus Paul (Rom. as above):the fact being, that the case Gen. xv. 8 πρεσβύτης The was not similar. Levites (see Num. iv. 3; viii. 24, 25) became superannuated at the age of fifty: but it appears, by extracts from the Rabbinical writings given by Lightfoot, that this was not the case with the priests.

The names of the angels, say the Rabbis, came up with Israel from Babylon. We first read of both Michael and Gabriel in the book of Daniel. But we are not therefore to suppose that they were borrowed from any heathen system, as Strauss and the rationalists have done; the fact being, that the persons and order of the angels were known long before, and their names formed matter of subsequent revelation to Daniel: see Professor Mill's Vindication of Luke, i., § 4, and note A; also Josh. v. 13—16. ό παρεστ. έν. τ. θ., one of the chief angels near the throne of God. They are called seven in Tobit (ibid.): see Dr. Mill's Tract, as above. 20.] We must not consider this dumbness solely as a punishment; it was also a sign, as Zacharias had required. It is impossible for us to say what the degree of unbelief in Zacharias was, and therefore we can be no judges as to his being deserving of the punishment (against Strauss and the rationalists). κ μ. δυν. λαλ.] This is not a repetition, but an explanation of the ground and reason, of σιωπων.

The words ἐθαύμαζον ἐν are best taken together, wondered at, as in ref. Sir. They may also be taken separately, taking èv as 'during:' and so Meyer: but this is not so probable. 22.] They knew, by some excitement, visible in his manner. It was not his office to pronounce the benediction, but that of the other incensing priest; so that his 'not being able to speak,' must mean, in answer to the enquiries which his unusual appearance prompted. This answer he gave by a sign: and the question was also by signs; for (see ver. 62) he was deaf, as well as dumb, which indeed is the strict meaning of κωφός - ούτε λαλων, ούτ' ακούων, Hesych. 23. ώς ἐπλήσ. That Mary was so, is no where expressed in the Gospels, but seems to be implied in ver. 32, and has been the general belief of Christians. The Son of David was to be the fruit of his body (Ps. exxxii. 11): which He would not be, unless His virgin mother was of the house of David. See notes on the genealogy in ch. iii. 36. συγγενής On the συγγενίς in the var. readd., we may remark, that these fem. terminations of common adjectives belong to later Greek. συγγενίς, ἐσχάτως βάρ-βαρον, Pollux iii. 50. What relation, no where appears in Scripture: and traditious are not worth recounting. But we must take the word in the narrower sense, not in the wider reference of Rom. ix. 3. Elisabeth was of the tribe of Levi: but this need not hinder connexion by marriage with other tribes. Aaron himself married into Judah, Exod. vi. 23. We find in Judg. xvii. 7 a young man of the family of Judah who was a Levite. Philo de Monarch. ii. 11 (vol. ii. p. 229), says, προς έταξε τῷ μεν ἀρχιερεί μνασθαι μη μόνον γυναϊκα παρθένον, άλλα και ιέρειαν έξ ιερέων . . . ἐπετράπη δὲ τοῖς ἄλλοις καὶ μὴ ἱερέων γαμεῖν θυ-γατέρας. 37.] The future, in Hebrew, expresses that which does not belong to any fixed time, but shall ever be SO. ρημα] See reff., and above on ver. 4. This place, and its original, Gon.

xviii. 14, which are sometimes quoted to shew that βημα may mean simply "a thing," are in fact most decisive against any such supposition. For the declaration amounts to this, "Hath the Lord spoken and can He not do it?" own faithful and humble assent is here given to the divine announcement which had been made to her. I believe that her conception of the Lord is to be dated from the utterance of these words. So Euthym .: ἀπ' αὐτῆς — ἤδη συλλαβούσης ἄμα τῷ λόγῳ αὐτοῦ. Similarly Iren., Tert., Ath., Maldonat., Grot. Lightfoot, holding a different opinion, says, Agnosco quidem, communiter obtinuisse, quod Virgo in urbe Nazareta conceperit, idque eodem instante quo Angelus eam alloquebatur. She was no unconscious vessel of the divine will, but (see ver. 45) in humility and faith, a fellow-worker with the purpose of the Father; and therefore her own unity with that purpose was required, and is here recorded.

39-56.] VISITATION OF ELISABETH BY MABY. 39.] The situation of Elisabeth was not before this known to Mary; and on the intelligence of it from the angel, she arose and went to congratulate her kinswoman. But before this the events related in Matt. i. 18-25 had happened. Mary being betrothed to Joseph, had no communications with him, except through the pronubæ; who, on the first indications of her pregnancy, represented it to him. This would not take longer time than the expression ev tais ήμ. ταύ. might include—possibly three or four weeks. Then happened Matt. i. 19, 20; and immediately Joseph took her home. As a betrothed virgin she could not travel; but now immediately, and perhaps for the very reason of the circumstances under which Joseph had taken her home, she visits Elisabeth,-remaining with her about three months, ver. 56. So that we have, five months, during which Elisabeth hid herself, + the sixth month, during which takes place the Annunciation, the discovery of Mary's pregnancy, her taking home by Joseph, + three months visit of Mary = nine months, nearly her full time: see ver. 57.

πόλιν 'Ιούδα may possibly mean "the city of Juttah," which (Josh. xxi. 16) was given, together with Hebron (in the hill country of Judæa: ib. ver. 11), and other neighbouring cities, to the children of Aaron the priest. But it may also mean 'a city of Judah;' and this is perhaps more likely, as no place of residence is mentioned for Zacharias in ver. 23,and one would hardly be introduced so abruptly here. See for 'Ιούδα thus used, Matt. ii. 6: Josh. xxi. 11. It is not Jerusalem; for that would hardly have been described as in the hill country; and from vv. 23, 65, the Evangelist clearly indicates some other place than Jerusalem as the residence of the parents of John.

41.] The salutation uttered by Elisabeth is clearly implied to have been VOL. I.

an inspiration of the Holy Spirit. No intimation had been made to her of the situation of Mary. The movement of the babe in her womb (possibly for the first time: vel nunc primum, vel saltem vehementius, quam pro more, Lightf.) was part of the effect of the same spiritual influence. The known mysterious effects of sympathy in such cases, at least lead us to believe that there may be corresponding effects where the causes are of a kind beyond our common experience.

τ. ἀσπασμ., not 'the salutation of Mary (the Annunciation),' but Mary's salutation: the former construction is not according to Luke's usage. 42. εὐλογ. has a double meaning: that of blessed,from above-blessed among women, i.e. beyond other women; and praised,-from below-i. e. called blessed by women. The former is the best rendering here: and then ev y. will be the Hebrew superlative, as in Jer. xxix. (xlix.) 15, and Cant. i. 8.

43. The word kupiou, as applied to the unborn babe, can no otherwise be explained than as uttered in the spirit of prophecy, and expressing the divine nature of our Lord: see especially Ps. cx. 1, from which Bleek thinks the expression is adopted. 45.] Either (as E. V., Vulg., Erasm., Beza, Meyer) blessed is adopted.

she that believed, for, &c., or blessed is she that believed that there shall be, &c. The last is maintained by Bengel and De Wette, and supported by Acts xxvii. 25. But I own it seems to me very improbable here; the sense and the period would both suffer ;- and the usage of these first chapters is to render a reason by one: see vv. 37, De Wette and Bleek urge 48, 49, 68. against it, that we should thus look for σοί and not $αὐτ \hat{η}$. But surely the preceding ή πιστεύσασα, rendering the sentence axiomatic, would prepare the way for the demonstrative pronoun of the third person, on either view of ori. I much prefer the former rendering, as agreeable likewise to the analogy of Scripture, where faith, in the recipient of the divine purposes, is so often represented as a co-ordinate cause of the fulfilment of those purposes. Lightf. well suggests, that there may have been present to the mind of Elisabeth the unvelief of her husband, as contrasted with Mary's faith. 46-55.7 Compare throughout the song of Hannah, 1 Sam. As connected with the defence of the hymns contained in these two chapters, we may observe, taking the very lowest ground, that there is nothing improbable, as matter of fact, in holy persons, full of the thoughts which permeate the O. T. prophecies, breaking out into such songs of praise as these, which are grounded on and almost expressed in the words of Scripture (see Dr. Mill, Historical character of Luke i. vindicated, p. 40 ff.). The Christian believer however will take a higher view than this, and attribute to the mother of our Lord, that same inspiration of the Holy Spirit which filled Elisabeth (ver. 41) and Zacharias (ver. 67). 46, 47. ψυχή – πνεθμα, the whole inner being: see on 1 Thess. v. 23.

She must necessarily have learnt it, in the course of communication by writing, from 62.] The natural inher husband. ference (see on ver. 22) from this verse is, that Zacharias was deaf as well as dumb; nor do I think Kuinoel, De Wette, Meyer, Olshausen, Bengel, Bleek, and Bp. Wordsworth have succeeded in invalidating this inference. There could have been no reason for beckoning, had Zacharias been able to hear articulate words. Bengel's reason, adopted by Bp. W., "commodius est muto innuentes videre quam loquentes audire," is surely too far-fetched.

sense of which see reff.) must be understood, as an object, τον λαον αὐτοῦ, contained in the following dative. κέρας—a metaphor from horned beasts, who are weak and defenceless without, but formidable with their horns: see reff.; and cf. Hor. Od. iii. 21. 18, 'addis cornua pauperi.' There does not seem to be any allusion (Selden, &c.) to the horns of the altar-the mere notion of a refuge is never connected with the Messiah's Kingdom. 70.] Meyer cites τοὺς ἀπ' αἰῶνος ἡήτορας, Longin. 34. 72. ποιῆσαι] For a similar use of the infinitive, see ver. 54. We may take it here either as of the purpose, "to perform . . . ," which is recommended by the $\delta \rho \kappa \sigma \nu$ $\delta \nu$ $\kappa.\tau.\lambda$., below,—or with Euthym., Bleek, al., as epexegetic, and equivalent to έν τῷ ποιῆσαι, or in English to a participial clause, 'performing,' &c.

73.] ὄρκον δν for δρκου, δν: see Gen. xxii. 16-18. Calvin, al., suppose the construction to be κατά τον ὅρκον ον; Grotius makes the words dependent on ελάλησεν above, as also the infin. ποιησαι: Bleek thinks that the accusative is directly governed by μνησθηναι, as well as the preceding genitive. "The Holy Spirit, speaking by Zacharias, seems to refer here to the providential dispensation signified in the names of the Baptist and his parents. The Baptist, by his name John, spake of the έλεος or grace of God: Zacharias (from זכר, recordatus fuit, and אין, Jah, Jehovah) signifies θεδς εμνήσθη, and Elisabeth (from אל, El, Deus, and אַבָּשׁ, sheba, juravit) is connected with the 8ρκος θεοῦ." Wordsw. This seems probable in the case before us: but the student must be reminded that it is ground to be very cautiously trodden, and where a morbid or pedantic fancy will be constantly going astray.

necessary to interpret kupiou of the Messiah: it may be said of God, whose people (ver. 77) Israel was. 78. avatolý is (see reff.) the LXX rendering for may a branch or sprout-and thus, 'that which springs up or rises,' as Light: - which, from the clauses following, seems to be the meaning here.

έξ ὕψ. may be taken with ἀνατ., as in E. V.:—or perhaps with the verb ἐπιφᾶ-But however taken, the expression is not quite easy to understand. The word had come apparently to be a name for the Messiah: thus in ref. Zech., ίδου ανήρ, 'Ανατολή δνομα αὐτῷ: and then figures arising from the meaning of the word itself, became mixed with that which was said of Him. The day-spring does not come ex "yous, but from beneath the horizon; but the Messiah does. Again the $\epsilon \pi i \phi \hat{a} \nu \pi i \kappa \tau \lambda$. of the next verse belongs to the day-spring, and only figuratively to the Messiah. See Bleek's long 79.] See reff. Care must be taken on the one hand not to degrade the expressions of this song of praise into mere anticipations of temporal prosperity, nor, on the other, to find in it (except in so far as they are involved in the inner and deeper sense of the words, unknown save to the Spirit who prompted them) the minute doctrinal distinctions of the writings of St. Paul. It is the expression of the aspirations and hopes of a pious Jew, waiting for the salvation of the Lord, finding that salvation brought near, and uttering his thankfulness in Old Testament language, with which he was familiar, and at the same time under prophetic influence of the Holy Spirit. That such a song should be inconsistent with dogmatic truth, is impossible: that it should unfold it minutely, is in the highest degree improbable. 80.] A very similar conclusion to those in ch. ii. 40, 52, and denoting probably the termination of that record or document of the birth of the Baptist, which the Evangelist has hitherto been translating, or perhaps transcribing already translated. That this first chapter is such a separate document, appears from its very distinct style. Whether it had been preserved in the holy family, or how otherwise obtained by Luke, no trace now appears. It has a certain relation to, and at the same time is distinguished from, the narration of the next chapter. The Old Testament spirit is stronger here, and the very phraseology more in unison with Hebrew usage.

ταις έρ. The δρεινή of Judæa was very near this wilderness, and from the character of John's official life afterwards, it is probable that in youth he would be given to solitude and abstemiousness. It cannot be supposed that the Essenes, dwelling in those parts, had any, or only the most general kind of influence over him, as their views were wholly different from his. avad., opening of his official life: see note on ch. x. 1.

CHAP. II. 1-20.] BIRTH OF CHRIST.
ITS ANNOUNCEMENT, AND CELEBRATION
BY THE HOSTS OF HEAVEN. 1, 2.]
We go back again now to the birth of John, or shortly after it. In annotating on these verses, I will first state the difficulty in which they appear to be involved,—then the remarkable way in which a solution has been found.

way in which a solution has been found. The assertion in these verses is this-that a decree went forth, &c., and that this enrolment first took place when Cyrenius (Quirinus, see below) was governor of Syria. It would then appear, either that this very enrolment took place under Quirinus, - or that the first did so, and this was subsequent to it. Now both of these senses formerly seemed to be inadmissible. For Quirinus was not known to have been governor of Syria till the year 758 U.C., after the banishment of Archelaus, and the addition of his territory to the province of Syria. της δὲ ᾿Αρχ. χώρας ὑποτελοῦς προςνεμηθείσης της Σύρων, πέμπεται Κυρήνιος ὑπὸ Καίσαρος, ανηρ ύπατικός, αποτιμησόμενος τα έν Συρία, καὶ τὸν ᾿Αρχελάου ἀποδωπόμενος οἶκον. Jos. Antt. xvii. 13. 5. And the birth of our Lord occurred at least eight years before this, previous to Herod's death, and when Sentius Saturninus was governor of Syria. But in a Commentatio of A. W. Zumpt of Berlin (the nephew of the distinguished grammarian of that name), De Syria Romanorum provincia ab Cæsare Augusto ad T. Vespasianum, he makes it highly probable that Quirinus was TWICE governor of Syria. The substance of his researches is as follows:-In 9 B.C. Sentius Saturninus succeeded M. Titius in the province of Syria, and governed it three years. He was succeeded by T. Quintilius Varus (Jos. Antt. xvii. 5. 2), who, as it appears, remained governor up to the end of 4 B.C. Thenceforward we lose sight of him till he is appointed to the command in Germany, in which he lost his life in A.D. 7. We also lose sight of the governors of Syria till the appointment of P. Sulpicius Quirinus, in A.D. 6. Now from the maxim acted on by Augustus (Dio Cass. lii. 23), that none should hold an imperial province for less than three or more than five years, Varus cannot have been governor of Syria during the twelve years from B.C. 6 to A.D. 6. Who then were the missing governors? One of them has been found, L. Volusius Saturninus, whose name occurs as "legatus Syriae" on a coin of Antioch, A.D. 4 or 5. But his proconsulate will not fill the whole time, and one or two governors must be supplied between Varus, ending 4 B.C., and Volusius, 4 or 5 A.D. Just in that interval falls the census, of which it is said in the text, that it πρώτη ἐγένετο ἡγεμονεύοντος της Συρίας Κυρηνίου. Could Quirinus have been governor at any such time? From Jan. to Aug B.C. 12 he was consul. Soon after that he triumphed over the Homonadenses ("mox expugnatis per Ciliciam Homonadensium castellis insignia triumphi adeptus," Tac. Ann. iii. 48). Now Zumpt applies the exhaustive process to the provinces which could by any possibility have been under Quirinus at this time, and eliminates from the enquiry Asia,—Pontus and Bithynia,—and Galatia. Cilicia only remains. But at this time, as he shews, that province had been reduced by successive diminutions, had been separated (Dio Cass. liv. 4) from Cyprus, and, as is shewn by the history of the misconduct of Piso soon afterwards, who was charged with having, as exgovernor of Syria, attempted "repetere provinciam armis" (Tac. Ann. iii. 12), because he had attacked Celenderis, a fort in Cilicia (ib. ii. 78-80), attached to the province of Syria. This Zumpt also confirms by the accounts in Tacitus (Ann. vi. 41; xii. 55) of the Clitæ, a seditious tribe of Cilicia Aspera, who on two occasions were repressed by troops sent by the governors of Syria. Quirinus then appears to have been governor of Syria at some time during this interval. But at what time? We find him in the East (Tac. Ann. iii. 48), as "datus rector C. Cæsari Armeniam obtinenti;" and this cannot have been during his well-known governorship of Syria, which began in A.D. 6; for Caius Cæsar died in A.D. 4. Zumpt, by arguments too long to be reproduced here, but very striking and satisfactory, fixes the time of his first governorship at from B.C. 4 to B.C. 1, when he was succeeded by M. Lollius. It is true this does not quite remove our difficulty. But it brings it within such narrow limits, that any slight error in calculation, or even the latitude allowed by the words πρώτη έγένετο might well cover it. I may mention it as remarkable, that Justin Martyr three times distinctly asserts that our Lord was born under Quirinus, and appeals to the register then made, as if from it the fact might, if necessary, be confirmed: Apol. i. 34, p. 65; 46, p. 71: Dial. 78, p. 175. We conclude then, that an ἀπογραφή or enrolment of names with a view to ascertain the population of the empire, was commanded and put in force at this time, unaccompanied (probably) by any payment of money. Mr. Greswell (vol. i. p. 511) cites a passage of Suidas-δτι Αύγουστος Καισαρ, δόξαν αὐτῷ, πάντας τοὺς οἰκήτορας 'Ρωμαίων (?) κατὰ πρόςωπον ἀριθμεῖ, βουλόμενος γνῶναι πόσον έστι πλήθος: and has made it probable that, notwithstanding a difficulty in the numbers, this was a census of the empire, and not of the city. We know (see Tacitus, Ann. i. 11: Sueton. Aug. 28, 101: Dio liii. 30; lvi. 33) that Augustus drew up a rationarium or breviarium totius imperii, which took many years to arrange and complete, and of which the enrolment of the inhabitants of the provinces would naturally form a part. Of the data for this compilation, the enrolment in our text might be one. That Judæa was not a Roman province at this time, is no objection to our text; for the breviarium of Augustus contained the 'regna' of the Roman empire, as well as the 'provincias.'

For a statement of the case and its difficulties as they stood before Zumpt's discovery, see Wieseler, Chronol. Synops. i. 73-122; and a good summary and criticism of the various hypotheses in Winer's Realwörterbuch, edn. 3, art. Quirinus: and a new and curious hypothesis in Bp. Wordsw. h. l., who inclines to reject the above solution. In Dio Cassius. where we might expect to find information, this portion of the reign of Augustus is apparently defective. Kυρην.] P. Sulpicius Quirinus (not Quirinius, for Kvρήνιος is the Greek form of Quirinus, Meyer ii. 222: see Sueton. Tib. 49: Tacit. Ann. iii. 48, where however Beck reads Quirinius). 3-5. There is a mixture here of Roman and Jewish customs, which is not at all improbable, considering the circumstances. In the Roman census, men, women, and children were all obliged to go and be enrolled. Dion. Hal. iv. 15, άπαντας ἐκέλευσε (ὁ Τύλλιος) τοὺς δμοπάγους κατὰ κεφαλην ωρισμένον νόμισμά τι συνειςφέρειν, έτερον μέν τι τους άνδρας, έτερον δέ τι τὰς γυναῖκας, ἄλλο δέ τι τοὺς ἀνήβους. But then this census was made at their dwelling-place, not at that of their extraction. The latter practice springs from the Jewish genealogical habits, and its adoption in this case speaks strongly for the accuracy of the chronology. If this enrolment was by order of Augustus, and for the whole empire, it of course would be made so as to include all, after the Roman manner: but inasmuch as it was made under the Jewish king Herod, it was done after the Jewish manner, in taking this account of each at his own place of extraction. Mary being apparently herself sprung from the lineage of David (see ch. i. 32), might on this account go to Bethlehem, being, as some suppose, an inheritress; but this does not seem to be the Evangelist's meaning, but that, after the Roman manner, she accompanied her husband. No stress must be laid on έμνηστ., as if she were only the betrothed wife of Joseph at this time; -she had been taken to his house before this: the history in our text happening during the time indicated by Matt. i. 25.

7.] Now that πρωτότοκον has disappeared from the text of St. Matthew [i. 25], it must be here remarked, that although the term may undoubtedly be used of an only child, such use is necessarily always connected with the expectation of others to follow, and can no longer have place when the whole course of events is before the writer and no others have followed. The combination of this consideration with the fact that brethren of our Lord are brought forward in this Gospel in close connexion with His mother, makes it as certain as any implied fact can be, that those brethren were the children of Mary herself.

Ancient tradition states the birthplace of our Lord to have been a cave: thus Justin Martyr, Dial. 78, p. 175, ἐπειδὴ Ἰωσὴφ οὐκ εἶχεν ἐν τἢ κώμη ἐκείνη ποῦ καπαλῦσαι, ἐν σπηλαίω τινὶ σύνεγγυς τῆς κώμης κατέλυσε· καὶ τότε, ὅντων αὐτῶν ἐκεῖ, ἐτετόκει ἡ Μαρία τὸν χριστόν, καὶ ἐν φάτνη αὐτὸν ἐτεθείκει. And Origen, against Celsus, i. 51, p. 367: ἀκολούθως τῆ ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ περὶ τῆς γειέσεως αὐτοῦ ἰστορία δείκνυται τὸ ἐν Βηθλεὲμ σπήλαιον ἔνθα ἐγεινήθη, καὶ ἡ ἐν τῷ σπηλαίῳ φάτνη ἔνθα ἐσπαργανώθη. Similarly Eusebius, Athanasius, and others. This tradition is nowise inconsistent with our text—for caves are used in most rocky countries as stables. Bleek has noticed that Justin Martyr refers to a prophecy in Isa. xxxiii. 16 (οὖτος οἰκήσει ἐν ὑψηλῷ σπηλαίῳ πέτρας ἰσχυρᾶς, LXX), and is disposed to think with Calov., al., that the tradition may have arisen from this. But is not the converse much more likely ἐ καταλύματι, a public inn, or place of reception for travellers; not 'a room in a private house,' for then the expression would be, 'They found no κατάλυμα.' Of what sort this inn was, does not appear. It probably differs from πανδοχείον, ch. x. 34, in not being kept by an host, πανδοχεύs: see note there.

8.] Mr. Greswell has made it highly probable (Diss. x. vol. i.) that our Lord was born on the evening of (i. e. which began) the 5th of April, the 10th of the Jewish Nisan: on which same day of April, and the 14th of Nisan, He suffered thirty-three years after. Before this time there would be abundance of grass in the pastures—the spring rains being over: but much after it, and till after the autumnal equinox again, the pastures would be comparatively bare: see note ou John vi. 10.

either, keeping watch by night, or, keeping the watches of the night. The former seems most probable: and so Meyer and Bleek: see ref. Xen., and add Alexis in Athen. xv. 58, p. 700-δ πρώτος εύρων μετὰ λυχνούχου περιπατεῖν Τῆς νυκτός, ήν τις κηδεμών των δακτύλων. δόξα-the brightness of God's presencethe Shechinah (see reff.) which also accompanied His angels when they appeared to men. It is agreeable at least to the analogy of the divine dealings, to suppose with Olshausen, that these shepherds, like Symeon, were waiting for the consolation 10, 11.] παντί τῷ λ., not (E. V.) to all people, here: but to all THE people,—the Jewish people. To them was the first message of joy, before the bursting in of the Gentiles-just as here the one angel gives the prefatory aunouncement, before the multitude of the heavenly host burst in with their proclamation of 'peace on earth.' a Saviour, as E. V.,-the name being particularized afterwards. χρ. κύρ.

This is the only place where these words come together. In ch. xxiii. 2 we have χρ. βασιλέα, and in Acts ii. 36 κύριον καλ χρ. (In Col. iii. 24 we have, in a somewhat different meaning (said to servants), τῷ κυρίῳ χριστῷ δουλεύετε.) And I see no way of understanding this kúpios, but as corresponding to the Hebrew JEHOVAH.

12.7 Olshausen hazards a conjecture that the stable or cave may possibly have belonged to these shepherds. But I think the words was B., ver. 15, do not look as if Bethlehem were their home. It seems clear that the spot was somehow known to them by the angel's description.

βρέφος -not 'the child;'-the angel in giving the sign, generalizes the termthey were to know the truth of his words, by finding a child wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger. 14. The disputes about this short song of praise are (with one exception, see below) so much solemn trifling. As to whether ¿στιν or έστω should be supplied, the same question might be raised of every proclamation which was ever uttered. The sense of both these is included. It is both There is, and Let there be, glory, &c. The song in the rec. is in three clauses, forming a Hebrew parallelism, in which the third clause is subordinate to and an amplification of the second, and so is without a εὐδοκία (see reff.) is that copula to it. good pleasure of God in Christ by which He reconciles the world to Himself in Him (2 Cor. v. 19). And this it is, whether είδοκία or εὐδοκίας be read. The interpretation of the latter reading by the vulg. and R.-Cath. interpreters generally, as "bone voluntatis," "peace on earth for those that like it," is untenable in Greek as well as in theology. The only passage which seems in any degree to justify it is Phil. i. 15, τινές δι' εὐδοκίαν τον χριστον κηρύσσουσιν, where however we have nothing like the harsh usage which must be assumed here, of the subjective gen. with the absolute sense of the noun. The only admissible rendering is, 'Among men of God's good pleasure,' i. e. among the elect people of God: cf. for the gen. Acts ix. 15 : Col. i. 13. And so Bleek renders : und auf Erben Friede unter den Menschen des Wohlgefallens, namlich, bes gottlichen Wohlgefallens. A curious connexion of εὐδοκίας with εἰρήνη is found in the passage of Origen-int. by which the gen. is supported :- " Pax enim quam non dat Dominus super terram non est pax bonæ voluntatis." This might perhaps be admissible as matter of mere construction, especially as St. Luke loves to separate genitives from their nouns in construction by an intervening word or words: but it would be difficult to justify it exegetically. As regards the reading, the evidence is materially affected by the fact that B reads εὐδοκίας a prima manu, as I have myself ascertained at Rome: and that & reads the same. I have therefore now edited the genitive without any marks of doubt. 1862. 15.] If the bracketed words be retained, it will be better to understand them as applying to the shepherds merely, than (with De Wette and Meyer) to suppose of avo. to be used as distinctive of the shepherds from the angels. Such distinctions are not usual, whereas the redundant ανθο. is: see reff. οἱ ποιμένες specifies what oi ἄνθρ. stated generally: the men, viz. the shepherds. 19.] ouver., in her ρήμ. may have its literal memory.

sense, words: viz. those spoken by the shepherds:-or its Hebraistic, as above, ver. 15, which is more probable-all these things now spoken of. συμβ., revolving them-comparing one with another.

21. HIS CIRCUMCISION. The second καί must not be rendered 'also.' It is simply redundant, as in reff. Lord was made like unto His brethren (Heb. ii. 17; iv. 15) in all weakness and bodily infirmity, from which legal uncleanness arose. The body which He took on Him, though not a body of sin, was mortal, subject to the consequence of sin,-in the likeness of sinful flesh: but incorruptible by the indwelling of the Godhead (1 Pet. iii. 18). In the fulfilment therefore of His great work of redemption He became subject to legal rites and purifications—not that they were absolutely necessary for Him, but were included in those things which were πρέποντα for Him in His humiliation and 'making perfect:' and in His lifting up of that human nature, for which all these things were absolutely necessary (Gen. xvii. 14), into the Godhead.

22-38.] THE PURIFICATION IN THE TEMPLE. SYMEON AND ANNA RECOG-NIZE AND PROPHESY OF HIM. See Levit. xii. 1--8, where however the child is not, as here, expressly included in the purification. (It is hardly possible that Joseph should be implied in the autor, as Euthym., Meyer, interpret it.) The reading αὐτοῦ is remarkable, and hardly likely to have been a correction. αὐτηs, adopted by the E. V., is almost without authority (see var. readd.), and is a manifest correction. Bengel denies that either the Lord or His mother wanted purification; and mentions that some render autôv ' of the Jews,' but does not approve of it (John ii. 6 is certainly no case in point). See the last note, on the necessity of purification for both. 23.7 God had taken the tribe of Levi instead of the firstborn that openeth the womb, 'Num. iii. 12, and required only the excess in number of the first-born over the Levites to be redeemed (ib. vv. 44-51). This arrangement appears afterwards to have been superseded by a general command to redeem all the first-born at five shekels of the sanctuary (Num. xviii. 15, 16).

24. The offering (ref. Levit.) was, a lamb for a burnt-offering, and a pigeon for a sin-offering: but if the parties were too poor to bring a lamb, then two pigeons. But as Bleek remarks, we are not hereby justified in assuming extreme poverty to have been the condition of our Lord's family. This no where appears from the gospel history. 25.] It appears that this Symeon might have been Symeon the son of Hillel,—and father of Gamaliel, mentioned in Acts v. 34 ff. But we have no means of ascertaining this. It is no objection to it that he is here merely ἄνθρωπos, seeing that Gamaliel himself is only φαρισαίός τις in Acts v. 34. παράκλ. See Acts xxviii. 20. It was a common form of adjuration among the Jews, 'Ita videam consolationem, si '&c., referring to On the general expectation of deliverance at this time, see on Matt.

26.7 Of the nature of this intimation, nothing is said. Symeon was the subject of an especial indwelling and leading of the Holy Ghost, analogous to that higher form of the spiritual life expressed in the earliest days by walking with God-and according to which God's saints have often been directed and informed in an extraordinary manner by His Holy Spirit. In the power of this intimation, and in the spirit of prophecy consequent on it, he came into the Temple on this occasion. 28. kaí here again is not also, but simply the introduction to the apodosis. 29.] ἀπολύεις, not τοῦ (ην, or ἐκ της γης,—but as being τον δοῦλόν σου, he thinks of his death as the termination of, and so dismissal from, his servitude. Lord, 'He that humbleth himself shall be exalted.' I prefer this last interpretation, as cohering best with the next verse: see note on it. 35.] This prophecy I do not believe to have its chief reference to the deep sorrows of the mother of our Lord on beholding His sufferings (Euthym., al.), much less to her future death by martyrdom (Epiphan., Lightf.); least of all to the Crucifixion, which by shedding the blood of her Son, would also pierce her heart and drain it of its life-blood and make it childless, as Bp. None of these interpretations satisfy us: for the words stand in a totally different connexion, and one far worthier of the honour of that holy woman, and of the spiritual character of Symeon's prophecy: that prophecy is, of the struggle of many in Israel through rerentance to faith in this Saviour; among which number even His mother herself was to be included. The sharp pangs of sorrow for sin must pierce her heart also (cf. esp. Acts ii. 37); and the general end follows; that the reasonings out of many hearts may be revealed; that they who receive the Lord Jesus may be manifest, and they who reject. Him: see John ix. 39. Similarly Bleek: finding moreover in the traces of her connexion with our Lord in the Evangelic history the piercing and dividing of her soul, and in the last notice of her in Acts i., the triumph of her faith after the turned from Jerusalem to Nazareth direct. But it is only an inference, and not the assertion of the text. This part of the gospel history is one where the Harmonists, by their arbitrary reconcilements of the two Evangelistic accounts, have given great advantage to the enemies of the faith. As the two accounts now stand, it is wholly impossible to suggest any satisfactory method of uniting them; every one who has attempted it has, in some part or other of his hypothesis, violated probability and common sense. But, on the other hand, it is equally impossible definitely to say that they could not be reconciled by a thorough knowledge of the facts themselves; and such an assertion, whenever made, shews great ignorance of the origin and course of oral narration. How many things will a relator say, being unaware of certain important circumstances outside his narrative, which seem to preclude those circumstances? How often will points of time be apparently brought close together in such a narration, -between which, events most weighty to the history have occurred? The only inference from these two accounts, which is inevitable, is, that they are wholly independent of one another. If Luke had seen the Gospel of Matthew, or vice versa, then the variations are utterly inexplicable; and the greatest absurdities of all are involved in the writings of those who assume this, and then proceed to harmonize. Of the dwelling at Nazareth before the Nativity, of the circumstances which brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, of the Presentation in the temple, Matthew's account knows nothing; of the visit of the Magi, the murder of the Innocents, the flight to Egypt, Luke's is unaware. In all the main circumstances of the Conception and Nativity they agree, or are easily and naturally reconciled (see further in note on John vii. 42).

At the age of twelve, a boy was called by the Jews בן ההורה 'son of the law,' and first incurred legal obligation. At that time, then, commences the second step (see note on ver. 52) of the life of the Lord, the time when the τὰ πρέποντα for Him began; his course of blameless legal obedience (see note on ver. 21) in his own person and by his own will. Now first (ver. 49) appear those higher consciousnesses to have found expression, which unfolded within Him, till the full time of his public ministry arrived. It cannot be inferred from this narrative, that it was the first time the holy Child had accompanied them to the Passover. τας ήμ., seven days, Exod. xii. 15, 17.

Nor must it be supposed from ἐπερωτ. that our Lord was acting the part of a master. It was the custom in the Jewish schools for the scholars to ask questions of their teachers; and a great part of the Rabbinical books consists of the answers of the Rabbis to such questions.

48—50.] The salient point of this narrative appears to lie in ὁ πατήρ σου contrasted with τοῦ πατρός μου. This was the first time that those wonderful words of self-consciousness had been heard from the holy Child—when He began to be "a son of the law," He first calls HIM His Father, Who gave Him the work to do on earth, of perfectly keeping that Law.

Every word of these verses is of the first importance to modern combatants for sound doctrine. Let the adversaries answer us. - why should his mother here have spoken and not Joseph, unless there were some more than usual reason for her being put forward rather than his reputed father? Again, let the mythical school of Strauss give us a reason, why an incident altogether (in their view) so derogatory to the character of the subject of it, should have been inserted, if the myths arose out of an exaggerated estimate of the dignity of that character? o mat. oou Then up to this time Joseph had been so called by the holy Child Himself: but from this time, never. Such words are not chance; had Mary said hueis, the strong contrast with what follows could not τί ὅτι ἐζ.;] have been brought out. τί, ὅτι . . . what (reason) is there, that . . .: see reff. This is no reproachful question. It is asked in all the simplicity and boldness of holy childhood... 'did ye not know?'... it appeared as if that conviction, the expression of which now first breaks forth from HIM, must have been a matter known to them before.

δεῖ] This is that δεῖ so often used by our Lord of His appointed and undertaken course. Analogous to this first utterance of His conviction, is the dawn, amongst ourselves, of the principle of duty in the youthful and well-trained spirit about this same age,—this 'earing time' of human progress: see below on ver. 52.

ἐν τοῖς τοῦ π.] Primarily, in the house of my Father (so in Sir. xlii. 10, ἐν τοῖς πατρικοῖς αὐτῆς: Theore. ii. 76, τὰ λύκωνος: Demosth. p. 1071, τὰ τοῦ ἀποθανόντος: see Lobeck on Phryn. p. 100); but we must not exclude the wider sense, which embraces all places and employments of my Father's (cf. ἐν τούτοις ἴσθι, 1 Tim. iv. 15). The best rendering would perhaps be,—among my Father's matters. The employment in which he was found, learning the word of God, would naturally be one of these.

avt. ov our.] Both Joseph and His mother knew in some sense, Who He was: but were not prepared to hear so direct an appeal to God as His Father: understood not the deeper sense of these wonderful words. Still (ver. 51) they appear to have awakened in the mind of His mother a remembrance of $\kappa\lambda\eta\theta\eta\sigma\epsilon\tau au$ vids $\theta\epsilon\omega$, ch. i. 35. And probably, as Stier remarks (i. 5), the unfolding of His childhood had been so gradual and natural, that even they had not been forcibly reminded by any strong individual notes, of that which He was, and which now shewed itself.

It is a remarkable instance of the blindness of the rationalistic Commentaries to the richness and depth of Scripture narrative, that Meyer holds this οὐ συνῆκαν to be altogether inconceivable as coming after the angelic announcement to Mary. Can he suppose that she συνῆκεν that announcement itself? De Wette has given the right interpretation, fie personal contents of the right interpretation of t standen nicht ben tiefern Ginn, and refers to chap. xviii. 34: so also Olsh., Ebrard. 51.] The high consciousness which had manifested itself in ver. 49 did not interfere with His self-humiliation, nor render Him independent of his parents. This voluntary subjection probably shewed itself in working at his reputed father's trade: see Mark vi. 2 and note. this time we have no more mention of Joseph (ch. iv. 22 is not to the point): the next we hear is of His mother and brethren (John ii. 12): whence it is inferred that, between this time and the commencement of our Lord's public life, Joseph died. καὶ ἡ μήτ.] These words tend to confirm the common belief that these opening chapters, or at least this narrative, may have been derived from the testimony of the mother of the Lord herself. She kept them, as in wonderful coincidence with the remarkable circumstances of His birth, and its announcement, and His presentation in the temple, and the offerings of the Magi; but in what way, or by what one great revelation all these things were to be gathered in one, did not yet appear, but was doubtless manifested to her afterwards: see Acts i. 14; ii. 1. ήλικ., probably not only 'stature' (as in ch. xix. 3), but age (ref. Matt.), which comprehends the other: so that ood. k. ήλ. would be wisdom, as well as age.

During these eighteen mysterious years we may, by the light of what is here revealed, view the holy Child advancing onward to that fulness of wisdom and divine approval which was indicated at His Baptism, by έν σοι εὐδόκησα. We are apt to forget, that it was during this time that much of the great work of the second Adam was done. The growing up through infancy, childhood, youth, manhood, from grace to grace, holiness to holiness, in subjection, self-denial, and love, without one polluting touch of sin, - this it was which, consummated by the three years of active ministry, by the Passion, and by the Cross, constituted "the obedience of one man," by which many were made righteous. We must fully appreciate the words of this verse, in order to think rightly of Christ. He had emptied Himself of His glory: His infancy and childhood were no mere pretence, but the Divine personality was in Him carried through these states of weakness and inexperience, and gathered round itself the ordinary accessions and experiences of the sons of men. All the time, the consciousness of his mission on earth was ripening; 'the things heard of the Father' (John xv. 15) were continually imparted to Him; the Spirit, which was not given by measure to Him, was abiding more and more upon Him; till the day when He was fully ripe for his official manifestation,—that He might be offered to his own, to receive or reject Him,-and then the Spirit led Him up to commence his conflict with the enemy. As yet, He was in favour with man also: the world had not yet begun to hate Him; but we cannot tell how soon this feeling towards Him was changed, for He alleges (John vii. 7), "Me the world hateth,

CHAP. III. 1—22.] PREACHING AND BAPTISM OF JOHN. DIVINE TESTIMONY TO JESUS AT HIS BAPTISM. Matt. iii. 1-17. Mark i. 4-11. 1. These dates are consistent with the ἀκριβῶς παρακοληυθείν which Luke predicates of himself, ch. i. 3. In Matt. iii. 1 we have the same events indicated as to time by only έν ταις ήμ. The fifteenth year of the sole principate of Tiberius began Aug. 19, U.C. 781, and reckoning backwards thirty years from that time (see ver. 23), we should have the birth of our Lord in v.c. 751 or about then; for ωςεί τριάκ. will admit of some latitude. But Herod the Great died in the beginning of the year 750, and our Lord's birth must be fixed some months at least before the death of Herod. If then it be placed in 749, He would have been at least thirty-two at the time of His baptism, seeing that it took place some time after the beginning of John's ministry. This difficulty has led to the supposition that this fifteenth year is not to be dated from the sole but from the associated principate of Tiberius, which commenced most probably at the end of U.c. 764. According to this, the fifteenth of Tiberius will begin at the end of v.c. 779-and our Lord's birth would be v.c. 749 or 50: which will agree with the death of Herod. This latter explanation has usually been adopted. Our present æra was fixed by Dionysius Exiguus, in the sixth century, and places the birth of our Lord in 754 v.c. It may be doubted, however, whether in all these reckonings more accuracy has not been sought than the Gospel narrative warrants any expectation of our finding. The wsei έτῶν τρ. is a wide expression, and might cover any age from thirty (see note on ver. 23) to thirty-two or thirty-three.

See on Matt. ii. 2, where it appears probable from astronomical considerations, that our Lord was born as early as U.C. Mr. Greswell has devoted several Dissertations to this enquiry: see his vol. i. p. 189 ff. ἡγεμ. Π. Πιλ.] Pilate was only Procurator of Judæa: the words cognate to ήγεμών being used promiscuously of the leading officers of the Roman government. Pontius Pi-LATE was the sixth procurator from the deposition of Archelaus, and came to Judæa about v.c. 779. He held the province ten years, and was sent to Rome to answer for his conduct by Vitellius, prefect of Syria, U.C. 789, the year of the death of Tiberius. See chronological table in Prolegg. Vol. II. 'Hρώδου | See note on Matt. xiv. 1. HEROD ANTIPAS became tetrarch of Galilee after the death of his father Herod, v.c. 750, and continued till he was deposed in 792. He built Casarea Philippi. He was by far built Cæsarea Philippi. He was by far the best of Herod's sons, and ruled his portion mildly and well. He must not be confounded with his half-brother Philip, whose wife Herodias Herod Antipas seduced. This latter was disinherited by his father, and lived in privacy. See note on Matt. xiv. 1. Josephus, Antt. xix. 5. 1, mentions it as among the districts which Claudius gave to king Agrippa I. under the name of Aβιλα ή Λυσανίου, and in B. J. ii. 11. 5, as έτέρα βασιλεία ή Λυσανίου καλουμένη. Antt. xx. 7. 1, he has 'Aβίλα. Λυσανία δὲ αύτη έγεγόνει τετραρχία: cf. also Ptolem. ν. 15, "Αβιλα ἐπικληθεῖσα Λυσανίου (making it, however, one of the cities of Decapolis). This Lysanias however was son of Ptolemy, the son of Minnæus (B. J. i. 13. 1), and was killed by Antony, at Cleonatra's instigation (B.C. 34). The Lysanias here mentioned may be some descendant of the other, since we find him here only ruling Abilene, whereas the other is called by Dio (xlix. 32), king of Ituræa. Now at his death we learn that the \hat{olkos} $\tau \hat{ov}$ $\Lambda v\sigma$. was farmed by one Zenodorus (Antt. xv. 10. 1), whom (ib. § 3) Augustus deprived of his ἐπαρχία, and at his death, which immediately followed, gave the principal of his districts, Trachonitis, Auranitis (Antt. xvii. 11. 4), &c., to Herod, B.C. 23. Among these Abilene is not named, and it therefore is possible that it may have been granted to a descendant of the former possessor. The silence of Josephus is no reason against this supposition, as he does not minutely relate the fortunes of districts which do not lie in the path of his history. The appellation of Aβιλα ή Λυσανίου again in the time of Claudius, after this appellation has disappeared so long, looks as if there had been another Augavias between. See Wieseler, i. 175 ff. Meyer, Comm. in loc. Bleek, Synoptische Erkl. in loc. 2.7 Annas (= Ananus, Jos. Antt. xviii. 2. 2) the high-priest, was deposed by Valerius Gratus (U.C. 779), and after several changes, Joseph or Caiaphas (Joseph. as above), his son-in-law (John xviii. 13), was made high-priest. It would appear from this verse (and the use of the singular, -εωs, renders the inference more stringent. Cf. also St. Luke's own phrase, Acts iv. 6) that Annas, as ex-high-priest, and possibly retaining in the view of the Jews the legitimate high-priesthood, was counted still as having the office: he certainly (John xviii. 13) exercised the power,-and had influence enough to procure the actual high-priesthood for five of his sons, after his own deposition, Jos. Antt. xx. 9. 1. A substitute, or deputy to the high-priest (called by the Talmudists סבן כהניא), appears to have been usual,see 2 Kings xxv. 18; and Annas would thus be able to evade the Roman appointment and keep the authority. ρημα θ.] See John i. 33. 3—6.] Matt. iii. 1. taining the corroboration of the account in Mark vi. 20 of John's boldness in rebuking Herod, with this slight variation that whereas in Mark Herod heard him gladly, and did many things in consequence, here the rebuke for general profligacy seems to have contributed to his imprisonment. These accounts however, though perfectly distinct, are by no means inconsistent. The same rebukes which stung Herod's conscience and aided the desire to imprison John, might work on that conscience, and cause the wish to hear more from the man of God. Vv. 19, 20 are in anticipation of what follows; which is in Luke's manner: see ch. i. 80.

21, 22.] Matt. iii. 13—17: Mark i. 9—11. Luke's account is much more concise than usual, and wholly independent of the others; see note on Mark i. 10: we have here however three additional particulars—1. that all the people had been baptized before the Lord's baptism: 2. that He was praying at the time of the descent of the Spirit: 3. that the Spirit appeared in a bodily form. On (1) we may remark that this is necessarily the meaning of $\ell\nu$ $\tau\hat{\varphi}$ $\beta\alpha\pi$.—for Luke when he means 'during,' &c. invariably uses the present; see for the past tense with $\ell\nu$ $\tau\hat{\varphi}$ reff. and ch. xiv. 1; xix. 15; xxiv. 30—for the present, ch. v. 1; viii. 5, &c., and for a comparison of the two, ch. viii. 40 and 42. On (3), see note at Matt. iii. 16, § 2.

would furnish what I conceive to be an undeniable one. Is it possible that either of these Evangelists could have set down his genealogy with that of the other before him? Would no remark have been made on their many and (on such a supposition) unaccountable variations? It is quite beside the purpose of the present commentary to attempt to reconcile the two. It has never yet been accomplished; and every endeavour to do it has violated either ingenuousness or common sense. I shall, as in similar cases, only indicate the landmarks which may serve to guide us to all that is possible for us to discover concerning them. (1) The two genealogies are both the line of Joseph, and not of Mary. Whether Mary were an heiress or not, Luke's words here preclude the idea of the genealogy being hers; for the descent of the Lord is transferred putatively to Joseph by the ώς ἐνομίζετο, before the genealogy begins; and it would be unnatural to suppose that the reckoning, which began with the real mother, would, after such transference, pass back through her to her father again, as it must do, if the genealogy be hers. The attempts of many, and recently of Wieseler, to make it appear that the genealogy is that of Mary, reading vids (ώs ἐνομ. τοῦ 'Ιωσήφ) τοῦ 'Ηλί, 'the son (as supposed of Joseph, but in reality) of Heli, &c.' are, as Meyer (Comm. in loc.) has shewn, quite unsuccessful: see Dr. Mill's vindication of the Genealogies, p. 180 ff. for the history of this opinion. (2) Luke appears to have taken this genealogy entire from some authority before him, in which the expression vibs θεοῦ as applied to Christ, was made good by tracing it up as here, through a regular ascent of progenitors till we come to Adam, who was, but here again inexactly, the son of God. This seems much more probable than that Luke should for his gentile readers have gone up to the origin of the human race instead of to Abraham. I cannot imagine any such purpose definitely present in the mind of the This view is confirmed by the entirely insulated situation of the genealogy here, between ver. 23 and ch. iv. 1. (3) The points of divergence between the genealogies are,-in Matt. the father of Joseph is Jacob-in Luke, Heli; this gives rise to different lists (except two common names, Zorobabel and Salathiel) up to David, where the accounts coincide again, and remain nearly identical up to Abraham, where Matt. ceases. (4) Here, as elsewhere, I believe that the accounts might be reconciled, or at all events good reason might be assigned for their differing, if we were in possession of data on which to proceed; but here as else-where, we are not. For who shall re-produce the endless combinations of elements of confusion, which might creep into a genealogy of this kind? Mat-thew's, we know, is squared so as to form three tesseradecads, by the omission of several generations; how can we tell that some similar step unknown to us may not have been taken with the one before us? It was common among the Jews for the same man to bear different names; how do we know how often this may occur among the immediate progenitors of Joseph? The levirate marriage (of a brother with a brother's wife to raise up seed, which then might be accounted to either husband) was common; how do we know how often this may have contributed to produce variations in the terms of a genealogy? . these elements of confusion, it is quite as presumptuous to pronounce the genealogies discrepant, as it is over-curious and uncritical to attempt to reconcile them. It may suffice us that they are inserted in the Gospels as authentic documents, and both of them merely to clear the Davidical descent of the putative father of the Lord. His own real Davidical descent does not depend on either of them, but must be solely derived through his mother. See much interesting investigation of the various solutions and traditions, in Dr. Mill's tract referred to above; and in Lord A. Hervey's work on the Genealogies of our Lord. 27. τ. Σαλαθ., τ. Chron. iii. 5: Zech. xii. 12. Kαϊνάμ] This name does not exist in our present Hebrew text, but in the LXX, Gen. x. 24; xi. 12, 13, and furnishes a curious instance of one of two thingseither (1) the corruption of our present Hebrew text in these chronological passages; or (2) the incorrectness of the LXX, and notwithstanding that, the high reputation which it had obtained in so short a time. Lightfoot holds the latter alternative: but I own I think the former more probable. See on the whole question of the appearance of this second Cainam(n) among the ancestors of our Lord, Lord A. Hervey's work above cited, ch. viii., in which, with much research and acuteness, he has endeavoured to shew that the name was probably interpolated here, and got from hence into the LXX. Certainly it appears not to have existed in the earliest copies of that version.

CHAP. IV. 1-13.] TEMPTATION OF JESUS. Matt. iv. 1-11. Mark i. 12, 13. Ver. 1 is peculiar to Luke, and very important. Our Lord was now full of the Holy Ghost, and in that fulness He is led up to combat with the enemy. He has arrived at the fulness of the stature of perfect man, outwardly and spiritually. And as when His Church was inaugurated by the descent of the Spirit in His fulness, so now, the first and fittest weapon for the combat is "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." The discourse of Peter in Acts ii., like our Lord's replies here, is grounded in the testimony of the The accounts of Matt. Scripture. and Luke (Mark's is principally a compendium) are distinct: see notes on Matt. 2.] The literal rendering and Mark. of the present text will be: Jesus was led by (in, in the power of, the èv of instrumentality by the conditioning element) the Spirit in the wilderness, being tempted (the pres. part. carries a slight ratiocinative force, as usual) during forty days by the devil. So that St. Luke, as also St. Mark, implies that the temptation continued the whole forty days.

And in observing this, I would once for all premise, (1) that I have no bias for finding such chronological inaccuracy, and have only done so where no fair and honest means will solve the difficulty; (2) that where internal evidence appears to me to decide this to be the case, I have taken the only way open to a Commentator who would act uprightly by the Scriptures, and fairly acknowledged and met the difficulty; (3) that so far from considering the testimony of the Evangelists to be weakened by such inaccuracies, I am convinced that it becomes only so much the stronger (see Prolegomena to the Gospels). These remarks have been occasioned by the relation of this account, vv. 14-30, to the Gospels of Matthew and John. Our verses 14 and 15 embrace the narrative of Matthew in

ch. iv. 12-25. But after that comes an event which belongs to a later period of our Lord's ministry. A fair comparison of our vv. 16-24 with Matt. xiii. 53-58 and Mark vi. 1-6, entered on without bias, and conducted solely from the narratives themselves, surely can hardly fail to convince us of their identity. (1) That two such visits should have happened, is of itself not impossible; though (with the sole exception of Jerusalem for obvious reasons) our Lord did not ordinarily revisit the places where He had been rejected as in our vv. 28, 29. (2) That He should have been thus treated at His first visit, and then marvelled at their unbelief on His second, is utterly impossible. (Stier, in the 2nd ed. of his Reden Jesu, says, with reference to the above position of mine, "To this we give a very simple answer: It was at their persistence in unbelief, after their first emotion and confusion, after His continued teaching and working of miracles, that He wondered." But it may fairly be rejoined, is there any sign of this in the narratives of Matt. and Mark? Is it not a forcing of their spirit to suit a preconceived notion?) (3) That the same question should have been asked on both occasions, and answered by our Lord with the same proverbial expression, is in the highest degree improbable. (4) Besides, this narrative itself bears internal marks of belonging to a later period. The ooa hkovo. yev. eis The Kadape. must refer to more than one miracle done there: indeed the whole form of the sentence points to the plain fact, that our Lord had been residing long in Capernaum. of the two pieces will be apparent: see further remarks in the notes below.

Here however is omitted an important cycle of our Lord's sayings and doings, both in Galilee and Jerusalem; viz. that contained in John i. 29-iv. 54 included. This will be shewn by comparing Matt. iv. 12, where it is stated that our Lord's return to Galilee was after the casting of John into prison, with John iii. 24, where, on occasion of the Lord and the disciples baptizing in Judæa, it is said, John was not yet cast into prison: see note on Matt. iv. 12. φήμη] The report, namely, of His miracles in Capernaum, wrought ἐν τη δυν. τ. πν., and possibly of what He had done and taught at Jerusalem at the feast. 15.] Olshausen well remarks (Bibl. Comm. i. 190), that this verse, containing a general undefined notice of our Lord's synagogue-teaching, quite takes from what follows any chronological character. Indeed we find throughout the carly part of this Gospel the same fragmentary stamp. Compare έν τοις σάββασιν, ver. 31-έν τῷ ἐπικεῖσθαι, ch. v. $1-\epsilon v \tau \hat{\omega} \epsilon \hat{l} v \alpha i \alpha \hat{v} \tau \cdot \hat{\epsilon} v \mu_i \hat{\alpha} \tau \cdot \pi \delta \lambda$, ch. v. 12-έν μιᾶ τ. ἡμερῶν, ch. v. 17; viii. 22εν ετέρφ σαβ., ch. vi. 6—εν ταις ήμ. 16.] οὐ ήν ταύτ., ch. vi. 12, &c. &c. τεθραμμένος = έν τῆ πατρίδι σου, ver. 23: see John iv. 44 and note.

κατὰ τὸ εἰωθός refers to the whole of what He did—it is not merely that He had been in the habit of attending the synagogues, but of teaching in them: see ver. 15. It was apparently the first time He had ever so taught in the synagogue at Nazareth. Δνέστη ἀναγν.] The rising up was probably to shew His wish to explain the Scripture; for so ἀναγν. imports. Ezra is called an ἀναγνώστης τοῦ θείου νόμου, Jos. Antt. xi. 5. 1. The ordinary way was, for the ruler of the synagogue to call upon persons of any learning or note to read and explain. That the demand of the Lord was so readily complied with, is sufficiently aecounted for by vv. 14, 15. See reff.

17.] It is doubtful whether the Rabbinical cycle of Sabbath readings, or lessons from the law and prophets, were as yet in use: but some regular plan was adopted; and according to that plan, after the reading of the law, which always preceded, the portion from the prophets came to be read (see Acts xiii. 15), which, for that sabbath, fell in the prophet Isaiah. The roll containing that book (probably, that alone) was given to the Lord. But it does not appear that He read any part of the lesson for the day; but when He had unrolled the scroll, found (the fortuitous, i.e. providential, finding is the most likely interpretation, not the searching for and finding) the passage which follows.

No inference can be drawn as to the time of the year from this narrative; partly on account of the uncertainty above mentioned, and partly because it is not ..iv. 19 (appv) Frag. Neap.

quite clear whether the roll contained only Isaiah, or other books also. 18-20. The quotation agrees mainly with the LXX:-the words ἀποστείλαι τεθρ. έν άφέσει are inserted from the LXX of Isa. lviii. 6. The meaning of this prophetic citation may be better seen, when we remember that it stands in the middle of the third great division of the book of Isaiah (ch. xlix.-lxvi.), that, viz. which comprises the prophecies of the Person, office, sufferings, triumph, and Church of the Messiah; -and thus by implication announces the fulfilment of all that went before, in Him who then addressed them. 18. πνεῦμα κ.] See Isa. xi. 2; xlii.

But it does not appear from what time this third year is reckoned, -or at what time of the year, with reference to the usual former and latter rains, the drought caused by Elias's prayer began (it apparently had begun some time before the prophet was sent to be miraculously sustained, as this very fact implies failure of the ordinary means of sustenance); and thus, without forming any further hypothesis, we have latitude enough given for the three and a half years, which seems to have been the exact time. This period is one often recurring in Jewish record and in prophecy: see Dan. vii. 25; xii. 7: Rev. xi. 2, 3; xii. 6, 14; xiii. 5. Lightfoot (ii. 123) produces more instances from the Rabbinical writers. "The period of three years and a half, = 42 months or 1260 days, had an ominous sound in the ears of an Israelite, being the time of this famine, and of the duration of the desolation of the temple under Antiochus." 28—30.] The same sort of rage possessed the Jews, Acts xxii. 22, on a similar truth being announced to them. This whole occurrence, whenever it happened in our Lord's ministry, was but a foreshadowing of His treatment afterwards from the whole nation of the Jews-a foretaste of είς τὰ ίδια ἢλθεν, καὶ οἱ ίδιοι αὐτὸν οὐ παρέλαβον (John i. 11). The expression of St. Paul, Rom. xi. 25, πώρωσις ὰπὸ μέρους τῷ Ἰσραὴλ γέγονεν, has been regarded as corresponding with the judicial infliction on these Nazarenes, by means of which our Lord passed out from among them. But see my note, and Ellicott's, on Eph. iv. 18, from which it appears that πώρωσις cannot mean blind-The modern Nazareth ness at all. is at a distance of about two English miles from what is called the Mount of Precipitation; nor is it built literally on the brow of that mount or hill. But (1) neither does the narrative preclude a considerable distance having been traversed, during which they had our Lord in their custody, and were hurrying with Him to the edge of the ravine; nor (2) is it at all necessary to suppose the city built on the οφρύς, but only on the mountain, or range of hills, of which the δφρύς forms a part-which it is: see Robinson, iii. 187. Our Lord's passing through the midst of them is evidently miraculous: the circumstances were different from those in John viii. 59, where the expression is ἐκρύβη καl έξηλθεν έκ τ. ίεροῦ: see note there. Here, the Nazarenes had Him actually in their custody. 31 f.] Mark i. 21, 22. The view maintained with regard to the foregoing occurrence in the preceding notes, of course precludes the notion that it was the reason of our Lord's change of habitation to Capernaum. In fact that change, as remarked on ver. 14, had been made some time before: and it is hardly possible that such an expression as λλθ. είς την Ν. οῦ ην τεθραμμένος should be used, if He still resided there. The words πόλιν της Γ. come in unnaturally after the mention of Kapapv. in ver. 23, and evidently shew that this was originally intended to be the first mention of the What may have been the reason of the change of abode is quite uncertain. It seems to have included the whole family, except the sisters, who may have been married at Nazareth, -see note on John ii. 12, and Matt. iv. 13.

gogue, on the popular mind. 44.7 See Matt. iv. 23-25 and notes. Kai ην κηρ. . . . is a formal close to this section of the narrative, and chronologically separates it from what follows. The reading της 'Ιουδαίας must, on any intelligible critical principles, be adopted; and Tregelles can hardly be acquitted of inconsistency with his own usual practice, in rejecting it. It is utterly inconceivable that it should have been a correction, seeing that Γαλιλαίας stands firm, with no various reading, in || Mark, from which the rec. reading here has come. (See however Mark i. 28, where X1 has 'Ioudaías for Γαλιλαίας: and Isa. ix. 1, where εis τὰ μέρη της 'Ιουδαίας is added to the Hebrew, by AN and one other uncial Ms.) This view is confirmed by the fact that two evangelistaria here read τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις; one, των 'Ιουδαίων, both being attempts to escape from the difficulty of της 'lovδαίας; while one adopts αὐτῶν, part of the sentence in | Mark. So far, however, being plain, I confess that all attempts to explain the fact seem to me futile. The three Evangelists relate no ministry in Judæa, with this single exception. And our narrative is thus brought into the most startling discrepancy with that of St. Mark, in which unquestionably the same portion of the sacred history is related. Still, these are considerations which must not weigh in the least degree with the critic. It is his province simply to track out what is the sacred text, not what, in his own feeble and partial judgment, it ought to have been.

CHAP. V. 1-11.] THE MIRACULOUS DRAUGHT OF FISHES. CALL OF PETER

AND THE SONS OF ZEBEDEE. The question at once meets us, whether this account, in its form here peculiar to Luke, is identical in its subject-matter with Matt. iv. 18-22, and Mark i. 16-20. With regard to this, we may notice the following particulars. (1) Contrary to Schleiermacher's inference (Trans. pp. 75, 76), it must be, I think, that of most readers, that a previous and close relation had subsisted between our Lord and Peter. The latter calls Him ἐπιστάτα (= ραββί), and κύριε: evidently (ver. 5, end) expects a miracle; and follows Him, with his partners, without any present express command so to do. Still all this might be, and yet the account might be identical with the others. For our Lord had known Peter before this, John i. 41 ff.; and, in all probability, as one of His disciples. And although there is here no express command to follow, yet the words in ver. 10 may be, and are probably intended to be, equivalent to one. (2) The Evangelist evidently intends this as the first apostolic calling of Peter and his companions. The expressions in ver. 11 could not otherwise have been used. (3) There is yet the supposition, that the accounts in Matthew and Mark may be a shorter way of recounting this by persons who were not aware of these circumstances. But then such a supposition will not consist with that high degree of authority in those accounts, which I believe them to have: see note on Mark. (4) It seems to me that the truth of the matter is nearly this : - that this event is distinct from, and happened at a later period than, the calling in Matt. and Mark; but υ έστῶτα παρὰ τὴν ελιμνην οἱ δὲ ν άλιεῖς ἀπ' αὐτῶν u = here only.Ψ ἀποβάντες x ἔπλυνον τὰ y δίκτυα. 3 z ἐμβὰς δὲ εἰς εν τῶν $\frac{19 \parallel Mk. only.}{Job xl.26}$ πλοίων δ ἢν $\frac{1}{2}$ ἱμωνος $\frac{1}{2}$ ἢρώτησεν αὐτὸν ἀπὸ τῆς $\frac{1}{2}$ ἢης $\frac{31}{2}$ $\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{31}{2}$ $\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{1}{2}$ that the four Apostles, when our Lord was at Capernaum, followed their occu-pation as fishermen. There is every thing to shew, in our account, that the calling had previously taken place; and the closing of it by the expression in ver. 11 merely indicates what there can be no difficulty in seeing even without it, that our present account is an imperfect one, written by one who found thus much recorded, and knowing it to be part of the history of the calling of the Apostles, appended to it the fact of their leaving all and following the Lord. As to the repetition of the assurance in ver. 10, I see no more in it than this, which appears also from other passages in the Gospels, that the Apostles, as such, were not called or ordained at any special moment, or by any one word of power alone; but that in their case as well as ours, there was line upon line, precept upon precept: and that what was said generally to all four on the former occasion, by words only, was repeated to Peter on this, not only in words, but by a miracle. Does his fear, as expressed in ver. 8, besides the reason assigned, indicate some previous slowness, or relaxation of his usually earnest attachment, of which he now becomes deeply ashamed? (5) It is also to be noticed that there is no chronological index to this narrative connecting it with what precedes or follows. It cannot well (see ver. 8) have taken place after the healing of Peter's wife's mother; and (ver. 1) must have been after the crowd had now become accustomed to hear the Lord teach. (6) Also, that there is no mention of Andrew here, as in ver. 10 there surely would have been, if he had been present. (7) It will be seen how wholly irreconcilable either of the suppositions is with the idea that Luke used the Gospel of Matt., or that of Mark, in 2.] επλυνον, 'ut compiling his own. peracto opere,' Bengel: see ver. 5.

This sense of unworthiness and self-loathing is ever the effect, in the depths of a heart not utterly hardened, of the Divine Power and presence. "Below

Compare, and indeed throughout this miracle, the striking parallel, and yet contrast, in John xxi.-with its injunction, 'feed My lambs,' 'shepherd My sheep,' given to the same Peter; its net which did not burst: and the minute and beautiful appropriateness of each will be seen: this, at, or near, the commencement of the Apostolic course; that, at how different, and how fitting a time! perhaps too subtle, and hardly accordant with the rules of emphasis, to find (with Mey. and Stier) a fitness in ζωγρών as expressing the ethical catching of men.

I prefer taking it as the word common to 12; ix. 18; xi. 1. This verse breaks off the sequence of the narrative.

The sequence of the hartacy. 17–26.] Heading of a paralytic. Math. ix. 2–8. Mark ii. 1–12. This miracle is introduced by the indefinite words, $\kappa a i \frac{\partial}{\partial x} \cdot \frac{\partial \nu}{\partial \mu} \mu \hat{a} \tau \cdot \hat{\eta} \mu$.: see reff. In Math. viii. 5–ix. 1, a series of incidents are interposed. Our Lord there appears to have returned from the country of the Gadarenes and the miracle on the demoniac there, to 'His own city,' i. e. Capernaum. The order in Mark is the same as here, and his narrative contains the only decisive note of sequence (ch. iv. 35), which determines his order and that in the text to have been the actual one, and the events in Math. viii. to be related out of their order. 17.] $\frac{\partial}{\partial \kappa} \pi ... \kappa \omega \mu$. not to be pressed: as we say, from all parts.

δύν. κυρ.] Does this mean the power of God—or the power of the Lord, i. e. Jesus? Mey. remarks that Luke uses κύριος frequently for Jesus, but always with the article: see ch. vii. 13; x.1; xi.

39; xii. 42, al. fr.:—but the same word, without the article, for the Most High; see ch. i. 11, 38, 58, 66; ii. 9; iv. 19; whence we conclude that the meaning is, the power of God (working in the Lord Jesus) was in the direction of His healing: i.e. wrought so that He exercised the powers of healing: and then a case follows. For construction see ref!

follows. For construction, see reff. αὐτόν has apparently been altered to αὐτούς from its difficulty. It might indeed be said that -ous may have been altered to -ov from the apparent difficulty of all these mentioned needing healing. So uncertain are merely subjective considerations either way: and so necessary is it to adhere in such cases, where any uncertainty exists, simply and faithfully to antiquity, as our best existing guide. 36. The latter part of this verse is peculiar, and is to be thus understood: if he does, he both will rend the new garment' (by taking out of it the $\epsilon \pi i \beta \lambda \eta \mu \alpha$), 'and the piece from the new garment will not agree with the old.' The common interpretation (which makes τὸ καινόν the nom. to σχίσει, and understands τὸ παλαιόν as its accus.) is inconsistent with the construction, in which to καινόν is to be coupled with ἐμάτιον, not with ἐπίβλημα. In Matt. and Mark the mischief done is differently expressed. Our text is very significant, and represents to us the spoiling of both systems by an attempt to engraft the new upon the old :- the new loses its completeness; the old, its consistency. 39.] This peculiar and important addition at once stamps our report with the very highest character for accuracy. Its apparent difficulty has perhaps caused its omission from Cod. D and mss. of the old Latin version. It contains the conclusion of the discourse, and the final answer to the question in ver. 33, which is not given in Matt. and Mark. The mióntes madaión are the Jews, who had long been habituated to the old system ;- the véos is the new wine (see on Matt.) of the grace and freedom of the Gospel: and our Lord asserts that this new wine was not palatable to the Jews, who said ὁ παλαιὸς χρηστός ἐστιν. Observe (against De Wette, &c.) that even with the common reading χρηστότερος there is no objective comparison whatever here between the old and new wine; the whole stress is on θέλει and λέγει γάρ, and the import of χρηστότερος is subjective: - in the view of him who utters it. And even if we were to assume such an objective comparison, it makes no difficulty. In time, the new wine will become older:-the man will become habituated to its taste, and the wine itself mellowed: and the comparison between the wines is not then which is the older, but which is intrinsically the better. observes (i. 328), that the saying is a lesson for ardent and enthusiastic converts not to be disappointed, if they cannot at once instil their spirit into others about them.

As regards the readings,-the sentence seems to have been tampered with by some who wished to make it more obvious, and to bring out the comparison more strongly: εὐθέως being inserted, better to correspond with the fact, and the matter in question, and the comparative substituted for the positive: but the sentence loses much of its point and vigour by the change: the old wine is not better than the new (which has not been tasted), but merely good, i.e. good enough: therefore no new is desired.

CHAP. VI.1-5.] THE DISCIPLES PLUCK EARS OF CORN ON THE SABBATH. Matt. xii. 1-8. Mark ii. 23-28. Between the discourse just related here and in Mark, and this incident, Matthew interposes the raising of Jaeirus's daughter, the healing of the two blind and one dumb, the mission of the twelve, and the message of John. I need not insist on these obvious proofs of independence in the construction of our On the question of the arrangements, see on Matt. 1 δευτεροπρώτω] This word presents much diffi-culty. None of the interpretations have any certainty, as the word is found no where else, and can be only judged of by analogy. (1) It is not altogether clear that the word ought to be here at all:see var. readd. Schulz supposes it to have arisen from putting together two separate glosses, in the margin of some Mss., one δευτέρω, the other πρώτω: - originally inserted,-the first, to distinguish this sabbath from that in ch. iv. 31,-the latter, from that in ver. 6. (2) Chrysostom, Hom. xxxix. on Matt., vol. vii. p. 431, says, δ δέ Λουκας φησιν Έν σαββάτω δευτεροπρώτω, τί δέ έστιν, έν δευτεροπρώτω; όταν διπλη ή άργία ή, και του σαβ-Βάτου του κυρίου, και έτέρας έορτης δια-Paulus and Olsh, also take δεχομένης. this interpretation. (3) Theophylact understands, -a sabbath, the day before which (παρασκευή) had been a Feast-day.

(4) Isidore of Pelusium, Euthym., and others, think that the first day of unleavened bread is meant, and is called δevτερόπ., because it is δευτέρα τοῦ πάσχα, which had been slain on the evening be-(5) Scaliger and Petavius interpret it to mean the sabbath following the second day of the Passover, from which the seven weeks to Pentecost were reckoned. This has been commonly followed; but is liable to the objection that the assumption, σάββ. δευτερόπρ. = σάββ. τῆς έβδομάδος δευτεροπρώτου = σάββ. τῆς έβδ. πρώτης μετά την δευτέραν των άζύμων, is an unjustifiable one. (6) To omit many other conjectures, I may mention that Wieseler (Chron. Synop. der 4 Evv., p. 231 ff.) suggests that it may mean the first sabbath in the second of the cycle of seven years, which completed the sabbatical period. He shews, by a passage from the κήρυγμα Πέτρου (Clem. Alex., Strom. vi. 5, p. 760 P.), that the Jews did call the first sabbath of the year πρῶτον—and that the years were reckoned as the first, second, &c., of the septennial cycle (see a decree of Jul. Cæsar in Jos. Antt. xiv. 10. 6). Thus the first sabbath of the first year would be $\pi \rho \omega \tau \delta \pi \rho \omega \tau \sigma \nu$ or $\pi \rho \omega \tau \sigma \nu$, that of the second δευτερόπρωτον, &c. And according to his chronology, which fixes this in A.U.C. 782, this year was the second of the sabbatical cycle. If we follow this conjecture, this day was the first sabbath in the month Nisan. The point so much insisted on, that this must have been after the presentation of the first-fruits which took place on the 16th of Nisan, -on account of the prohibition in Levit. xxiii. 14.—is of no weight, as it is very uncertain whether the action mentioned here is

As regards the analogy of the word, $\delta \epsilon \nu \tau \epsilon \rho \sigma \delta \epsilon \kappa \dot{\alpha} \tau \eta$, sometimes cited from Jerome on Ezek. xlv., is not to the point: for that word represents the fact that "rursus ex ipsis decimis Levitæ, hoc est inferior ministrorum gradus, decimas dabant sacerdotibus:" so that it was not "the second-tenth," as Wordsw., but a tenth of a tenth,—a second tithing of a tithe. $\psi \dot{\omega} \chi. \ \tau. \ \chi. \ is a \ detail peculiar to$

6-11.7 HEALING OF THE WITHERED HAND. Matt. xii. 9-14. Mark iii. 1-6. See on Matt. 6.] The circumstances related in ch. xiv. 1-6 are very similar to these; and there Luke has inserted the question of Matt. vv. 11, 12. I should be disposed to think that Mark and Luke have preserved the exact narrative here. Matthew, as we see, describes the watching of the Pharisees (τοὺς διαλυγισμοὺς αὐτῶν, Luke, ver. 8) as words actually spoken, and relates that they asked the question: which certainly arises from an imperfect report of what took place, the question itself being verbatim that which our Lord asked on that other occasion, Luke xiv. 3, and followed by a similar appeal about an animal. There can hardly be a doubt that in Matthew's narrative the two occurrences are blended:

and this may have taken place from the very circumstance of the question about an animal having been asked on both occasions; Luke omitting it here, because he reports it there—Matthew joining to it the question asked there, because he was not aware of another similar incident.

ή δεξ. is a mark of accuracy, and from an eye-witness. 9.] The words in the rec. text, $\ell \pi$. $\delta \mu \hat{\alpha} \approx \tau \ell \xi \ell \pi \tau \nu$, admit of two constructions according as they are punctuated: 'I will ask you what is allowable on the sabbath,—to do good, or to do evil?' $(\ell \pi. \delta \mu. \tau \ell \xi \ell \kappa. \tau. \lambda.)$; or, 'I will ask you a certain thing: Is it,' &c. $(\ell \pi. \delta \mu. \tau \iota \xi \ell \kappa. \tau. \lambda.)$). This latter is preferable, both on account of the future $\ell \pi \ell \rho$., and of its similarity to $\ell \rho \nu \tau \ell \tau \ell \kappa \ell \nu$. After the question, Mark adds of $\ell \ell \ell \nu \ell \nu \ell \nu$. After the question, Mark adds of $\ell \ell \nu \ell \nu \ell \nu \ell \nu$. The reduction is treferred to in ch. xx., because they

10.] Mark adds μετ' όργης συλλυπούμενος έπὶ τῆ πωρώσει τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν—one of the most striking and graphic descriptions in the Gospels. It was thus that He bare (see Matt. viii. 17), even while on earth, our sins and infirmities. Their hearts were hardened,-but He grieved for it. 11. avoías] It does not appear that this word can ever mean, as in some former editions, 'madness,' rage of a senseless kind: certainly it does not in reff., nor in Herod. vi. 69 or Thuc. iii. 48, there carelessly referred to. The proper meaning, 'senselessness,' 'wicked folly,' must be kept to. See Ellicott's note on 2 Tim. iii. 9, to which I owe this correction. διελάλ., viz. the Pharisees and Herodians: Mark ver. 6, where see note.

12-19. CALLING AND NAMES OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. Peculiar (in this form) to Luke: see Matt. xii. 15—21: Mark iii. 13—19. We may observe that Matt. does not relate the choosing of the Apostles, but only takes occasion to give a list of them on their being sent out, ch. x. 1 ff.; and that Mark and Luke agree in the time of their being chosen, placing it immediately after the healing on the sabbath,-but with no very definite note of time. 12. γ τ. ήμ. τ. is vague in date, and may belong to any part of the period of our Lord's ministry now before us. I believe it to be a form of acknowledgment on the part of the Evangelist, that he did not determine exactly into what part of this period to bring the incident so introduced. Indeed the whole of this paragraph is of a supplementary and indefinite character, serving more as a preface to the discourse which follows, than as an integral part of the narration in its present sequence. This of course in no way affects the accuracy of the circumstances therein related, which nearly coincide in this and the cognate, though independent, account of Mark. έξελθείν-viz. from Capernaum. τὸ ὄρος] See on Matt. v. 1. προς εύξ.] See note on ch. v. 16.

a level place—i.e. possibly, as has been suggested by some, on a flat ledge or shelf on the side of the mountain; but more naturally below the mountain: see on Matt. v. 1. Whether Luke could thus have written with the Gospel of Matthew before him, I leave the reader to judge: premising, that is, the identity of the two discourses.

19.] Luke uses the same expression, of power going forth from our Lord. in ch. viii. 46.

Lord, in ch. viii. 46. 20-49. SERMON ON THE MOUNT (?). Peculiar (in this form) to Luke, answering to Matt. v .- vii. On the whole question of the identity or diversity of the two discourses, see on Matt. v. 1. In Matthew I cannot doubt that we have the whole discourse much as it was spoken; the connexion is intimate throughout; the arrangement wonderfully consistent and admirable. Here, on the other hand, the discourse is only reported in fragmentsthere is a wide gap between vv. 26 and 27, and many omissions in other parts; besides which, sayings of our Lord, belonging apparently to other occasions, are inserted: see vv. 39, 40, 45. At the same time we must remember, that such gnomic sayings would probably be frequently uttered by Him, and might very likely form part of this discourse originally. His teaching was not studious of novelty like that of men, but speaking with authority, as He did, He would doubtless utter again and again the same weighty sentences when occasion occurred. Hence may have arisen much of the difference of arrangement observable in the reportsbecause sayings known to have been uttered together at one time, might be thrown together with sayings spoken at another, with some one common link perhaps connecting the two groups. 20. eis to the disciples generally,—to the Twelve particularly,—to the people prospectively; and its subject, both here and in Matt., is, the state and duties of a disciple of Christ. πτωχοί] To suppose that Luke's report of this discourse refers only to this world's poverty, &c .- and the blessings to anticipated outward prosperity in the Messiah's Kingdom (De Wette, Meyer), is surely quite a misapprehension. Comparing these expressions with other passages in Luke himself, we must have concluded, even without Matthew's report, that they bore a spiritual sense: see ch. xvi. 11, where he speaks of 'the true riches,' and ch. xii. 21, where we have είς θεὸν πλουτῶν. And who would apply such an interpretation to our ver. 21?

See on each of these beatitudes the corresponding notes in Matt. $\dot{\eta}$ $\beta \omega \sigma$. τ . θ . $= \dot{\eta}$ $\beta \omega \sigma$. τ . $o \dot{v} \rho \omega \nu \dot{\omega} \nu \dot{\omega}$ Matt., but it does not thence follow that $o \dot{v} \rho \omega \dot{v} \dot{\omega} = \theta \epsilon \dot{\sigma} s$, but the two are different ways of designating the same kingdom—the one by its situation—in heaven, where its $\pi \sigma \lambda_i \tau \epsilon i \alpha$ is $(\dot{\eta} \dot{\omega} \nu \dot{\omega})$ Tepovo $\alpha \lambda \dot{\eta} \dot{\mu}$, Gal. iv. 26), the other by Him, whose it is. 22.] $\dot{\alpha} \dot{\phi} \rho \rho i \sigma \dot{\omega} \dot{\omega} \dot{\omega}$ and $\dot{\epsilon} \kappa \dot{\mu} \dot{\omega} \dot{\omega}$ must not be understood of Jewish excommunication only, but of all kinds of expulsion from society.

24.] Of course (see Prolegg. ch. i.) I cannot assent to any such view as that taken by Meyer and others, that these 'woos' are inserted from later tradition (gehören zur Formation ber ſpātern llebertirferung); in other words, were never spoken by our Lord at all:—either we must suppose that they ought to follow Matt. v. 12, which is from the context most improbable,—or that they, and perhaps the four preceding beatitudes with them, were on some occasion spoken by our Lord in this exact form, and so have been here placed in that form.

26.] Not said to the rich, but to the disciples. The very warning conveyed in ψενδοπροφ, shews this, and should have prevented Meyer from making the blunder. The mention of προφ, and ψενδοπροφ, has reference to the disciples' office as the salt of the earth. The address in ver. 27 is not (Meyer) a turning of the discourse to His own disciples, but ψμὶν λέγω τοῖς ἀκούουσιν = ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, which introduces the same command Matt. v. 44,—

(2) 'causing no one to despair,' i.e. refusing no one (reading $\mu\eta\delta\epsilon\nu$ ': cf. $\Xi[\Pi]\aleph$ in various readings);—so the Syr. renders it. (3) 'not despairing,' i.e. 'without anxiety about the result.' This last sense of the word is best supported by examples, both from Polybius (e.g. ἀπελπ. τὰ πράγματα, i. 19. 12, - την σωτηρίαν, ii. 54. 7, al. freq., see Index), and the Apocrypha, - see reff. νίοι ὑψίστου] Meyer maintains that this must mean 'sons of God' in the sense of partakers of the glory of the Messiah's Kingdom, but without reference to the state of believers in this life, which last he says is according to the usage of Paul, not of the three first Evangelists. But surely this is sufficiently answered by δ $\pi \alpha \tau \dot{\eta} \rho$ ύμων in the next verse, where the actual present sonship to our heavenly Father is a reason why we should imitate Him.

connexion, and it is impossible that it should consist of savings thrown together and uttered at different times. connexion with what went before is not so evident, indeed the εἶπεν δὲ π. αὐτ. seems to shew a break. The parabolic saying, implying the unfitness of an uncharitable and unjustly condemning leader (the Lord was speaking primarily to His Apostles) to perform his office, leads to the assertion (ver. 40) that no Christian ought to assume in this respect an office of judging which his Master never assumed; but rather will every well-instructed Christian strive to be humble as his Master was. Then follows the reproof of vv. 41—43; and vv. 44, 45 and 46-49 shew us, expanded in different images, what the beam in the eye is, to which our first efforts must be directed. τυφλ. τ. οδ.] See this in quite another connexion, Matt. xv. 14, where

Peter answers, φράσον ἡμῖν τὴν παραβολην [ταύτην]—meaning apparently the last uttered words, which the Lord however explains not specifically, but by entering into the whole matter. I believe this παραβολή to have been one of the usual and familiar sayings of our Lord. 40.7 See above. κατηρτισμένος (see reff.)—fully instructed—perfect, in the sense of 'well-conditioned,' knowing what is his duty, and consistently endeavouring to do it. De Wette, Kuinoel, &c., have given a strange rendering of this clause, making κατηρτ. ώς ὁ δ. αὐτ. the predicate—'every disciple will be instructed as his Master.' But if I mistake not, the position of κατηρτ. as first in the sentence forbids this rendering.

41.] De Wette imagines a break in the sense here, and a return to Matt. vii. 3 f.; -but the whole is in the strictest connexion: see above. 43.] The Kapmos

σαπρός = the δοκὸς ἐν τῷ ὀφθ. If thy life is evil, it is in vain to pretend to teach 45. Again the closest connexion of sense and argument; nor is this verse (De Wette) put here because of the similarity of the preceding verses to Matt. xii. 33 reminding the compiler of ver. 35 there. Do these expositors suppose that our Lord only once spoke each of these central sayings, and with only one reference? 46-48. The connexion goes on here also-and our Lord descends into the closest personal searching of the life and heart, and gives His judicial declaration of the end of the hypocrite, whether teacher or private Christian: 48.] ἔσκαψεν see notes on Matt. κ. εβάθυνεν-not a mere hendiadys for G TOV

The οὐδέ brings into emphasis, not εμαυτόν, as distinguished from others, but the whole following clause; " neither did I adopt that course.

11-16.7 RAISING OF A DEAD MAN AT NAIN. Peculiar to Luke. τῆ έξῆς] With regard to the variety of reading here, Schulz remarks that St. Luke, when χρόνω is understood, uses έν τω καθεξής, see ch. viii. 1. On the other hand Meyer observes that when huépa is understood, he never prefixes èv:-see reff. :- so that internal as well as external evidence is divided. NAIN occurs no where else in the Bible. It was a town of Galilee not far from Capernaum, a few miles to the south of Mount Tabor, 'on the northern slope of the rugged and barren ridge of Little Hermon, Stanley. A poor village has been found in this situation with ruins of old buildings. See Robinson, iii. 226. The κώμη καλουμένη Ναΐν (or Nats) of Josephus, B. J. iv. 9. 4, on the borders of Idumea, is a different place. See Winer, Realw.; and Stanley's description, Sinai and Palestine, p. 357, edn. 3.

This is one of the three greatest recorded miracles of our Lord: of which it has been observed, that He raised one (Jaeirus's daughter) when just dead, - one on the way to burial, - and one (Lazarus) who had been buried four days.

12. ἐξεκ. The Jews ordinarily buried outside the gates of their cities. The kings however of the house of David were buried in the city of David; and it was a denunciation on Jehoiakim that he should be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem. Jer. xxii. 19. "One entrance alone Nain could have had; that which opens on the rough hill side in its downward slope to the plain. It must have been in this steep descent," &c. Stanley, ut supra. The usage of μονογενής with a dative is classical: cf. Herod. vii. 221, τον δε παίδα . . . εόντα οι μουνογενέα: Æsch. Agam. 872, μονογενές τέκνον πατρί.

αῦτ. χήρα] Some few cursive mss. read this in the dative (omg. $\hat{\eta}\nu$), kal $a\mathring{v}\tau\hat{\eta}$ $\chi\hat{\eta}\rho\alpha$ (see also the readg. of D): but even in this case it is more agreeable to Luke's usage to take it as a nominative. See ch. ii. 25, 36, and accentuate, as there, αύτη.

14.] The σορός (= λάρναξ, Jos. Antt. xv. 3. 2) was an open coffin. There was something in the manner of our Lord which caused the bearers to stand still. We need not suppose any miraculous influence over them. All three raisings from the dead are wrought with words of power,- 'Damsel, arise,'- 'Young man, arise,'- Lazarus, come forth.' Trench quotes an eloquent passage from Massillon's sermons (Miracles, p. 241),- 'Elie ressuscite des morts, c'est vrai; mais il est obligé de se coucher plusieurs fois sur le corps de l'enfant qu'il ressuscite : il souffle. il se rétrécit, il s'agite : on voit bien qu'il invoque une puissance étrangère; qu'il rappelle de l'empire de la mort une âme qui n'est pas soumise à sa voix: et qu'il n'est pas lui-même le maître de la mort et de la vie. Jésus-Christ ressuscite les morts comme il fait les actions les plus communes: il parle en maître à ceux qui dorment d'un sommeil éternel: et l'on sent bien qu'il est le Dieu des morts comme des vivans,—jamais plus tranquille que lorsqu'il opère les plus grandes choses.'

15. ἔδ. αὐ. τῆ μ. αὐ.] Doubtless there was a deeper reason than the mere consoling of the widow (of whom there were many in Israel now as beforetime), that influenced our Lord to work this miracle: Olshausen (vol. i. p. 271) remarks, "A reference in this miracle to the raised man himself is by no means excluded. Man, as a conscious being, can never be a mere means to an end, which would here be the case, if we suppose the consolation of the mother to have been the only object for which the young man was raised." He goes on to say that the hidden intent was probably the spiritual awakening of the youth; which would impart a deeper meaning to ἔδωκεν αὐτ. τη μ. αὐ. and make her joy to be a true and abiding one.

16.] φόβος, the natural result of witnessing a direct exhibition of divine power: compare ch. v. 8. προφ. μέγ.] For they had only been the greatest of prophets who had before raised the dead,— Elijah and Elisha; and the Prophet who was to come was doubtless in their minds. an opinion has been entertained from the earliest times. Origen on Matt. xxvi. 6 ff., vol. iii. p. 892, mentions and controverts it. It has been held in modern times by Grotius, Schleiermacher, Ewald, and Hug: and recently by Bleek. But the only particular common to the two (unless indeed we account the name of the kost to be such, which is hardly worth recounting), is the anointing itself; and even that is not strictly the same. The character of the woman,-the description of the host,-the sayings uttered,-the time,-all are different. And if the probability of this occurring twice is to be questioned, we may fairly say, that an action of this kind, which had been once commended by our Lord, was very likely to have been repeated, and especially at such a time as 'six days before the last Passover,' and by one anointing Him for I may add, that there His burial. is not the least reason for supposing the woman in this incident to have been Mary Magdalene. The introduction of her as a new person so soon after (ch. viii. 2), and what is there stated of her, make the notion exceedingly improbable. 36-38.7 The exact time and place are indeterminatethe occasion of Luke's inserting the history here may have been the φίλος τελωνών κ. άμαρτωλῶν in ver. 34. Wieseler places it at Nain, which certainly is the last πόλις that has been named: but it is more natural to suppose τη πόλει to refer only to τη ciκία before—the city where the house was. Meyer thinks that the definite article points out Capernaum. The position of the words ev T. moder in the amended text requires a different rendering from 'a woman in the city which was a sinner.'

We must either render, 'which was a sinner in the city,' i. e. known as such in the place by public repute,-carrying on a sinful occupation in the place,—or (2) regard ητ. ην έν τ. πόλ. as parenthetic, 'a woman which was in the city, a sinner.' The latter seems preferable.

άμαρτωλός, in the sense usually understood-a prostitute: but, by the context, penitent. not however to be taken as a pluperfect. She was, even up to this time (see ver. 39), a prostitute (compare Augustine, Serm. xcix. (xxiii.) 2, vol. v. "Accessit ad Dominum immunda, ut rediret munda:" which can-not, as Wordsw., be explained away by what follows, "accessit confessa, ut rediret professa." The latter was a matter of course, otherwise she would not have come at all)-and this was the first manifestation of her penitence. "Quid mirum, tales ad Christum confugisse, cum et ad Johannis baptismum venerint?" Matt. xxi. 32 (Grotius). It is possible, that the woman may have just heard the closing words of the discourse concerning John, Matt. xi. 28-30; but I would not press this, on account of the obvious want of sequence in this part of our Gospel. The behaviour of the woman certainly implies that she had heard our Lord, and been awakened by His teaching.

ἀλάβ. μ.] For the word, &c., see on Matt. xxvi. 7. Our Lord would, after the ordinary custom of persons at table, be reclining on a couch, on the left side, turned towards the table, and His feet would be behind Him. She seems to have embraced His feet (see Matt. xxviii. 9), as it was also the Jews' custom to do by way of honour and affection to their Rabbis (see Wetstein on this passage), and kissed them, and in doing so to have shed abundant tears, which, falling on them, she wiped off with her hair. It does not appear that this latter was an intentional part of her honouring our Lord: had it been, there would hardly have been an article before δάκρυσιν. As it stands, τοις δάκρυσιν is the tears, implied in κλαίουσα, - the tears which she shed,—not 'her tears,' which would be δάκρυσιν only. The ointment here has a peculiar interest, as being the offering by a penitent of that which had been an accessory in her unhallowed work 39. είπ. ἐν ἐαυ λέγων This phraseology is perhaps a mark of translation from the Hebrew. The Pharisce assumes that our Lord did not know who, or of what sort, this woman was, and thence doubts His being a prophet (see ver. 16);—the possibility of His knowing this and permitting it, never so much as occurs to him. It was the touching by an unclean person which constituted the defilement. This is all that the Pharisee fixes on: his offence is merely technical and ceremonial. 40.] ἀποκριθείς perhaps to the disgust manifested in the Pharisee's countenance; for that must have been the ground on which the narrative relates ver. 39. We must not however forget that in similar cases iδων δ Ίησ. τὰς ἐνθυμήσεις αὐτῶν is inserted (Matt. ix. 4), and doubtless might also have been here. There is an inner personcl appeal in the words addressing the Pharisee. The calling by name—the especial έχω σοί τι είπειν, refer to the inner thoughts of the heart, and at once bring the answer διδάσ., εἰπέ, so different from ούτος εί ήν προφήτης. 41.] We must remember that our Lord is here setting forth the matter primarily with reference to Simon's subjective view of himself, and therefore not strictly as regards the actual comparative sinfulness of these two before God. Though however not to be pressed, the case may have been so: and, I am inclined to think, was so. The clear light of truth in which every word of His was spoken, will hardly allow us to suppose that such an admission would have been made to the Pharisee, if it had not really been so in fact. But see more below. δύο χρ.] The debtors are the prominent persons in the parablethe creditor is necessary indeed to it, but is in the background. And this remark is important-for on bearing it carefully in mind the right understanding of the parable depends. The Lord speaks from the position of the debtors, and applies to their case the considerations of ordinary gratitude and justice. And in doing so it is to be noticed, that he makes an assumption for the purpose of the parable:that sin = the sense of sin, just as a debt is felt to the amount of the debt. The disorganization of our moral nature, the deadly sedative effect of sin in lulling the conscience, which renders the greatest sinner the least ready for pemtence, does not here come into consideration; the examples being two persons, both aware of their debt. This assumption itself is absolutely necessary for the parable: for if forgiveness is to awaken love in proportion to the magnitude of that which is forgiven, sin in such a connexion must be the subjective debt which is felt to exist, not the objective one, the magnitude of which we never can know, but God only: see on ver. 47 below. κόσια . . . πεντήκοντα—a very different ratio from the ten thousand talents and the hundred pence in Matt. xviii. 21-35, because there it is intended to shew us how insignificant our sins towards one another are in comparison with the offence of us all before God. 42. μή έχόντων . . . έχαρίσατο What depth of meaning there is in these words, if we reflect Who said them, and by what means this forgiveness was to be wrought! Observe that the un ex. is pregnant with more than at first appears :- how is this incapacity discovered to the creditor in the parable? how, but by themselves? Here then is the sense and confession of sin; not a bare objective fact, followed by a decree of forgiveness: but the incapacity is an avowed one, the forgiveness is a personal one,—àµporépois. rís ouv . .;] The difficulty usually found in this question and its answer is not wholly removed by the subjective nature of the parable. For the sense of sin, if wholesome and rational, must bear a proportion, as indeed in this case it did, to the actual sins committed: and then we seem to come to the false conclusion,

'The more sin, the more love: let us then sin, that we may love the more.' And I believe this difficulty is to be removed by more accurately considering what the love is, which is here spoken of. It is an unquestionable fact, that the deepest penitents are, in one kind of love for Him who has forgiven them, the most devoted; -in that, namely, which consists in personal sacrifice, and proofs of earnest attachment to the blessed Saviour and His cause on earth. But it is no less an unquestionable fact, that this love is not the highest form of the spiritual life; that such persons are, by their very course of sin, incapacitated from entering into the length, breadth, and height, and being filled with all the fulness of Christ: that their views are generally narrow, their aims onesided:-that though ἀγάπη be the greatest of the Christian graces, there are various kinds of it; and though the love of the reclaimed profligate may be and is intense of its kind, (and how touching and beautiful its manifestations are, as here!) yet that kind is not so high nor complete as the sacrifice of the whole life,-the bud, blossom, and fruit,-to His service to whom we were in baptism dedicated. For even on the ground of the parable itself, in that life there is a continually freshened sense of the need, and the assurance, of pardon, ever awaking devoted and earnest love. 43.] In the ὑπολαμβάνω of Simon, we have, understood, "that is, if they feel as they ought."

that Simon had been deficient in the ordinary courtesies paid by a host to his guests-for these, though marks of honour sometimes paid, were not (even the washing of the feet, except when coming from a journey) invariably paid to guests: -but that he had taken no particular pains to shew affection or reverence for his Guest. Respecting water for the feet, see Gen. xviii. 4: Judg. xix. 21. Observe the contrasts here: - ὕδωρ, - δάκρυσιν ('fudit laerymas, sanguinem cordis,' Aug. Serm. xeix. (xxiii.) 1, vol. v.), - φίλημα οὐκ ἔδωκ. (on the face),—καταφιλούσα τοὺς πόδας: — ἐλαίφ τὴν κεφ., μύρφ (which was more precious) τοὺς πόδας. ἀφ' ῆς εἰςῆλθ.] These words will explain one difficulty in the circumstances of the anointing: how such a woman came into the guest-chamber of such a Pharisec. She appears by them to have entered simultaneously with our Lord and His disciples. Nor do vv. 36, 37 at all preclude this idea: -ἐπιγνοῦσα ὅτι κατάκειται may mean, 'having knowledge that He was going to dine,' &c. If she came in His train, the Pharisee would not exclude her, as He was accustomed to gather such to hear Him: it was the touching at which 47.] This verse has he wondered. been found very difficult to fit into the lesson conveyed by the Parable. But I think there need be little difficulty, if we regard it thus. Simon had been offended at the uncleanness of the woman who touched our Lord. He, having given the Pharisee the instruction contained in the parable, and having drawn the contrast between the woman's conduct and his, now assures him, 'Wherefore, seeing this is so, I say unto thee, she is no longer unclean-her many sins are forgiven: for (thou seest that) she loved much: her conduct towards Me shews that love, which is a token that her sins are for-given.' Thus the one is not the causative particle, 'because she loved much;' but, as rightly rendered in E. V., for she loved much: 'for she has shewn that love, of which thou mayest conclude, from what thou hast heard, that it is the effect of a sense of forgiveness. Thus Bengel, 'Remissio peccatorum, Simoni non cogitata, probatur a fructu, ver. 42, qui est evidens et in oculos incurrit, quum illa sit occulta;'-and Calov., 'probabat Christus a posteriori. But there is a deeper consideration in this solution, which the words of the Lord in ver. 48 bring before us. The sense of forgiveness of sin is not altogether correspondent to the sense of forgiveness of a debt. The latter must be altogether past, and a fact to be looked back on, to awaken gratitude: the former, by no means so. The expectation, the desire, and hope of forgiveness, the mioris of ver. 50, awoke this love; just as in our Christian life, the love daily awakened by a sense of forgiveness, yet is gathered under and summed up in a general faith and expectation, that 'in that day' all will be found to have been forgiven. The ἄφεσις τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, into which we have been baptized, and in which we live, yet waits for that great ἀφέωνταί σου αί άμαρτίαι, which He will then pronounce.

The agrist ἡγάπησεν is in apposition with the agrists throughout vv. 44-46, as referring to the same facts.

Remark that the assertion regarding Simon is not ai ολίγαι ἀφέωνται, but ολίγον ἀφίεται; stamping the subjective character of the part relating to him :he felt, or cared about, but little forgiveness, and his little love shewed this to be so: on the whole, see Bleek's note.

14. ὑπό must not be taken (Meyer) as belonging to πορευόμενοι (ὑπὸ μερ. αντί του μετά μερ., Euthym.), for no such usage of the preposition is found in the N. T., and the sense would be tame and frigid in the extreme; but ὑπό belongs to συνπνίγονται, and πορευόμενοι (which Meyer contends would have no meaning in this case) is in its ordinary sense of going their way, namely, after having heard the word: see for this usage of πορεύομαι Matt. ii. 8; ix. 13; xi. 4 al. (but not Mark, except xvi. 10 ff., where see note), and Luke vii. 22; ix. 13 al. freq. It is surprising that such a critic as Meyer should have upheld so absurd an interpretation as that impugned above. τοῦ βίου belongs to all three substantives. 15. It has been said, on Matt. ver. 23, that all receptivity of the seed is from God-and all men have receptivity enough to make it matter of condemnation to them that they receive it not in earnest, and bring not forth fruit:—but there is in this very receptivity a wide difference between men; some being false-hearted, hating the truth, deceiving themselves,—others being earnest and simple-minded, willing to be taught, and humble enough to receive with meekness the engrafted word. It is of these that our Lord here speaks; of this kind was Nathanael, the Israelite indeed in whom was no guile, John i. 48: see also John xviii. 37, "Every one that is of the truth, heareth My voice," and Trench on the Parables, in loc.

καλὸς καὶ ἀγαθός has here nothing to do with its classical sense of edgevis, but is purely ethical,—and to be rendered as in E. V., honest and good.

16-18. Mark iv. 21-25, where see notes. The sayings occur in several parts of Matt. (v. 15; x. 26; xiii. 12), but in other connexions. Euthym. remarks well, εἰκὸς δὲ κατὰ διαφόρους καιρούς τὰ τοιαῦτα τὸν χριστὸν εἰπεῖν. On the meaning of the separate sayings, see notes on the passages in Matt. Observe that ver. 18, πως ἀκούετε = τι ἀκούετε Mark, and δοκεῖ έχειν = έχει Mark.

19-21.] THE MOTHER AND BRETHREN OF JESUS SEEK TO SEE HIM. Matt. xii. 46-50. Mark iii. 31-35. The incident is introduced here without any precise note of sequence; not so in Matt., who says, after the discourse in ch. xii., ἔτι αὐτοῦ λαλοῦντος τοῖς ὅχλοις and Mark και ἔρχονται . . . having before stated, ver. 21, that His relations went out to lay hold of Him, - for they said, " He is beside Himself." We must conclude therefore that they have it in the exact place, and that Luke only inserts it among the events of this series of discourses, as indeed it was, but without fixing its place. His account is abridged, and without marks of an eyewitness, which the others have. If we read λεγόντων, it may be observed that we have the same elliptic gen. absol. in Hom. The chronology of this occurrence would be wholly uncertain, were it not for the precision of Mark, who has introduced it by ev exelvy τῆ ἡμέρα ὀψίας υἴσης,—i. e. on the same day in which the preceding parables were delivered. How it has come to be misplaced in Matthew, must ever be matter of obscurity. Mark or Luke to have drawn up their account from Matt., or with Matt. before them, seeing that he mentions two possessed throughout? Would no notice be taken of this? Then indeed would the Evangelists be but poor witnesses to the truth, if they could consciously allow such a discrepancy to go forth. Of the discrepancy itself, no solution has been proposed which can satisfy any really critical mind. That one should have been prominent, and the spokesman is of course possible, but such a hypothesis does not help us one whit. Where two healings take place, narrators do not commonly, being fully aware of this, relate in the singular: and this is the phænomenon to be accounted for. It is at least reasonable to assign accuracy in such a case to the more detailed and chronologically inserted accounts of Mark and Luke. οὐκ ἐν. is to be taken literally. απέθν., was dying. In Matt. she is represented as already dead. He is not aware of the subsequent message to Jaeirus, and narrates concisely and generally.

The crowd seems to have followed to see what would happen at Jaeirus's house: see ver. 54.

43.] προς αναλ., 'having, besides all her suffering, spent,' &c. But,—see notes on μὴ προς εῶντος τοῦ ἀνέμου, Acts xxvii. 7, and on συμμαρτυρείν, Rom. ii. 15; viii. 16; ix. 1,—προς- may denote the direction or tendency of her spending. Mark adds, that she grew nothing better, but rather worse. The omission of this clause, iaτρ. προςαν. δλ. τ. β., in some of the best MSS., is curious. I have not ventured to exclude it, on account of the characteristic απαξ λεγόμενον προςαναλώσασα, which seems to betray St. Luke's hand. The an' instead of bn', which latter may have come from the $\delta\pi\delta$ $\pi\delta\lambda$ λῶν ἰατρῶν of St. Mark, conveys a slightly differing sense. ὑπό is more of direct agency, àπό of ultimate derivation. She could get no relief from any system of treatment adopted by any. 44.] Her inner thoughts are given in Mark, ver. There was doubtless a weakness and error in this woman's view;-she imagined that healing power flowed as it were magically out of the Lord's person; and she touched the fringe of his garment as the most sacred, as well as the most accessible part: see Matt. xxiii. 5: Num. xv. 37-40. But she obtained what she desired. She sought it, though in error, yet in faith. And she obtained it, because this faith was known and recognized by the Lord. It is most true objectively, that there did go forth healing virtue from Him, and from his Apostles (see Mark vi. 56: Luke vi. 19: Acts v. 15; xix. 12), but it is also true that, in ordinary cases, only those were receptive of this whose faith embraced the truth of its existence, and ability to heal them. The error of her view was overborne, and her weakness of apprehension of truth covered, by the strength of her faith. And this is a most encouraging miracle for us to recollect, when we are disposed to think despondingly of the ignorance or superstition of much of the Christian world: that He who accepted this woman for her faith even in error and weakness, may also accept them. 45.] We are not to imagine that our Lord was ignorant of the woman, or any of the circumstances. The question is asked to draw out what followed. the part of Jesus Himself, an undeniable instance of this, in ch. xxiv. 19-and note there. av. A detail contained only here. On the latter part of this verse many instructive remarks have been made in sermons—see Trench, Mir. p. 192, note (edn. 2)-to the effect that many press round Christ, but few touch Him, only the faithful. Thus Augustine, Sic etiam nunc est corpus ejus, id est, Ecclesia ejus. Tangit eam fides paucorum, premit turba multorum' (Serm. lxii. 3 (5), vol. v.). And Chrysostom, ὁ πιστεύων είς τον σωτῆρα ἄπτεται αὐτοῦ ὁ δὲ ἀπιστῶν θλίβει αὐτὸν καὶ λυπεῖ. It is difficult to imagine how the miracle should be, as Bp. Wordsw., "a solemn warning to all who crowd on Christ:" or how such a forbidding to come to Him should be reconciled with δεῦτε πρός με πάντες . . . Rather should we say, seeing it was one of those that thus crowded on Him who obtained grace from Him, that it is a blessed encouragement to us not only to crowd on Him, but even to touch Him: so to crowd on Him as never to be content till we have grasped if it be but His garment for ourselves: not to despise or discourage any of the least of those who "make familiar addresses to Him in (so called) religious hymns," seeing that thus some of them may touch Him to the healing of their souls. I much fear that if my excellent friend had been keeping order among the multitude on the way to the house of Jaeirus, this poor woman would never have been allowed to get near to Jesus. But I hope and trust that he and I shall rejoice together one day in His presence amidst a greater crowd, whom no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues.

47.] It is not necessary (though perhaps probable), from the ἀρν. δὲ πάντων ver. 45, that the woman should also have denied with them. She may have hidden herself among the crowd. Our Lord (Mark ver. 32) looked around to see τὴν τοῦτο ποι-ήσασαν—a wonderful precision of expression, by which His absolute knowledge of the whole matter is set before us.

τρέμ. + είδυῖα ὁ γέγονεν αὐτῆ Mark; which is implied here. All this is omitted in Matt.; and if we had only his account, we should certainly derive the wrong lesson from the miracle; for there we miss altogether the reproof, and the shame to which the woman is put; and the words of our Lord look like an encomium on her act itself. Her confession ἐνώπ. παν. τ. λ., is very striking here, as shewing us that Christ will have Himself openly confessed, and not only secretly sought: that our Christian life is not, as it is sometimes called, merely 'a thing between ourselves and God;' but a good confession, to be witnessed ἐνώπιον παν. τ. λ. 48.] How lovingly does our Lord re-assure the trembling woman; her faith saved her-not merely in the act of touching, but as now completed by

Mark's addition, ἴσθι ύγ. ἀπὸ τ. μάστιγός σου, is important, as conveying to her an assurance that the effect which she felt in her body should be permanent; that the healing about which she might otherwise almost have doubted, as being surreptitiously obtained, was now openly ratified by the Lord's own word. 49. Little marks of accuracy come out in each of the two fuller accounts. Here we have έρχεταί Tis, which was doubtless the exact fact :- in Mark ἔρχονται,—generally expressed. In Mark again we learn not only that Jesus heard, - but παρακούσας τον λόγον λαλούμενον, i. e. it was not reported to Him, but He overheard it being said, which is a minute detail not given here. but to bring out the sequence in our narrative here, which unless we get the right meaning for ἀφῆκεν, seems disturbed. 53.] The maiden was actually dead, as plainly appears from the είδότες ὅτι ἀπέθ. The words οὐκ ἀπ. ἀλ. κ. are no ground for surmising the contrary: see note on Matt. ver. 24.

54. Mark gives the actual Aramaic words uttered by the Lord, ταλιθά κοῦμ.

55.] her spirit returned: see reff., in the former of which death had not taken place, but in the latter it had; so that no inference adverse to her actual death can be derived from the use of the The command to give her to eat, shews that she was restored to actual life with its wants and weaknesses; and in that incipient state of convalescence, which would require nourishment. mony of Mark here precludes all idea of a recovery from a mere paroxysm - $\kappa a = \pi \epsilon \rho \iota$ επάτει. One who ἐσχάτως εἶχεν at the time of the father's coming, and then died, so that it could be said of the minstrels and others who had time to assemble, εἰδότες ὅτι ἀπέθανεν,—could not, supposing that they were mistaken and she was only in a trance, have risen up and walked, and been in a situation to take meat, in so short a time after. Every part of the narrative combines to declare that the death was real, and the miracle a raising from the dead, in the strictest sense. The injunction, however, was not observed; for we read in Matt., εξηλθεν ή φήμη αύτη είς όλην την γην έκείνην.

CHAP. IX. 1-5.] MISSION OF THE TWELVE. Matt. x. 5-15. Mark vi. 7-13. Mark's account agrees nearly exactly with the text. The discourse is given at much greater length in Matt., where see 1.] θεραπεύειν belongs to δύν. καὶ ἐξουσ., as in 1 Cor. ix. 5; some join it with ἔδωκεν, as in John v. 26: Matt. xiii. 3.] μήτε [ἀνὰ] δύο χ. ἔχειν-α mixed construction; -the former clause having been in the second person, this is added as if it had been in the infin., alpeiv. 7-9. HEROD ANTIPAS HEARS OF THE FAME OF JESUS THROUGH THE DOINGS OF THE TWELVE. Matt. xiv. 1-12. Mark vi. 14-29. How inexplicable would be the omission of the death of John the Baptist, by the Evangelist who has given so particular an account of his ministry, (ch. iii. 1-20,) if Luke had had before him the narratives of Matt. and Mark.

7. δπ' αὐτοῦ, of the rec., though a gloss, points to the right account of the matter. Herod (see Mark) heard the account of the miracles wrought by the Twelve: but even then it was to ovoua αὐτοῦ which was spread abroad. These works were done in their Master's Name, and in popular rumour passed for His.

ING OF THE FIVE THOUSAND. Matt. xiv. 13-21. Mark vi. 30-44. John vi. 1-13. Compare the notes on each of 10. He went in a ship (Matt., Mark, John), of which our Evangelist seems not to have been aware; for we should gather from our text that it was by land. A great difficulty also attends the mention of Bethsaida here. At first sight, it would appear to be the wellknown Bethsaida, on the western bank of the lake, not far from Capernaum. But (1) our Lord was on this side before, -see ch. viii. 37; and (2) Mark (vi. 45) relates that after the miracle of the loaves He caused His disciples to cross over to Bethsaida. But there were two places of this name:—another Bethsaida (Julias) lay at the top of the lake, on the Jordan: see Stanley, p. 381, edn. 3: Van de Velde, index, sub voce. Now it is very likely that our Lord may have crossed the lake to this Bethsaida, and St. Luke, finding that the miracle happened near Bethsaida, and not being aware of the crossing of the lake, may have left the name thus without explanation, as being that of the other Bethsaida. Mark gives us the exact account: that the Lord and the disciples, who went by sea, were perceived by the multitude who went by land, $\pi \epsilon \hat{\xi}_{R}^{n}$, and arrived before Him. How any of these accounts could have been compiled with a knowledge of the others, I cannot imagine.

11.] See note on Mark ver. 34. ἀποδεξάμ.] This word includes what Mark tells us of His going forth from His solitude, or perhaps landing from the ship, and seeing a great multitude, and having compassion on them; having received them, i. e. not sent them away.

12.] As the three agree in their account, and John differs from them, see the difference discussed in notes there. In

(ordinarily, and De Wette) or κόφ. (Meyer), but best, it appears to me, the latter, - because the article is not expressed as in Matt. Immediately after this miracle, Matt., Mark, and John relate the walking on the sea, which, and the whole series of events following as far as Matt. xvi. 12,-the healings in the land of Gennesaret, the discourse about unwashen hands, the Syrophænician woman, the healing of multitudes by the sea of Galilee, the feeding of the 4000, the asking of a sign from Heaven, and the forgetting to take bread, - are wholly omitted by our Evangelist. Supposing him to have had Matt. before him, how is this to be explained? It is also an important observation, that the omission by Luke of the second miracle of feeding is not to be adduced against its historical reality, as has been done by Schleiermacher (transl. p. 144), since it is only omitted as occurring in the midst of a large section, which the accounts gathered by Luke did not contain. We see also, that the characteristic kodivous of the first feeding is preserved, without any confusion of terms: σπυρίδας being always used in relating and referring to the secoud,-Matt. xv. 37; xvi. 10: Mark viii. 8, 20.

There is no improbability, nor contradiction to John's account that the multitudes sought to make Him a king, in our Lord's asking this question. We must remember that such enquiries were not made by Him for information, but as a means of drawing out the confession of others, as here. 20.1 See the important addition, the promise to Peter, in Matt. vv. 17—19.

Ver. 22 as far as àmortar. is nearly verbatim with Mark; the last according to the Commentators, Mark has compiled his account from Matt. and Luke. The almost verbal agreement of the three in so solemn and sad an announcement, is what we might expect. Such words would not be easily forgotten.

wonders :'-that would give no sense,-for the disciples were thinking exclusively of those already: nor strictly (Stier, but corrected in edn. 2) 'what I am about to tell you,' so that τουs λ. τ. should be | with τὸ ρημα below: but these sayings, of which this was now the second ;- 'these intimations which I make to you from time to time respecting My sufferings and death.' The Resurrection, expressly mentioned in the others, is omitted here.

45.] "va-not to be evaded by forcing it to mean 'so that they did not ...,' but to be rendered that they might not, as in Matt. i. 22 al. It was the divine purpose, that they should not at present be aware of the full significancy of these words.

46-50.] JESUS REBUKES THE DISCI-PLES FOR THEIR EMULATION AND EX-CLUSIVENESS. Matt. xviii. 1-5. Mark ix. 33-40. The most detailed account is in Mark, where I have discussed the differences in the three narratives. There is not the least occasion to confine διαλ. to the sense of an inward doubt and questioning in the heart of each; indeed I will venture to say that no interpreter would have thought of doing so, had not the narratives of Matt. and Mark, by mentioning an outward expression of this thought, offered a temptation to discover a discrepancy, -of which Meyer, as usual, has not failed to avail himself. Had our narrative stood by itself, we should have understood it, as I do now, of a dispute which had taken place or was taking place, and which, though not actually spoken out before the Lord, was yet open to His discerning eye, so that not only the words, but the disputing of their thoughts, was known to Him. idea of $\tau \delta$ τis δv $\epsilon i\eta$ μ . meaning that each one thought "Who is greater than I?" (Meyer, in loc.) is absurd enough. Still more absurd however is the harmonistic attempt of Greswell, to make two distinct events out of (1) the incident in Mark and Luke, and (2) that in Matthew; one, 'absente Petro,' the other 'reverso Petro, discipuli sponte contentionem suam ad Jesum referunt; de qua Ille uti prius, sed uberius, disserit.' (Harmony, p. 192, 3.) He has been led into this partly by the lower, literal-harmonistic spirit which pervades his school, and partly by the assumption which connects this strife and discourse immediately with the incident about the tribute-money,-for which there is not the least ground in the text of Matt. 48.] The discourse as here related has the closest connexion and harmony. The dispute had been, who (among the Twelve) should be greatest,—i.e. greatest in the kingdom of heaven: for other greatness is not to be thought of,—the minds of the disciples being always on this, as just about to appear (against De Wette and Meyer); and our Lord reminds them that no such precedence is to be thought of among those sent in His name; for that even a little child, if thus sent, is clothed with His dignity; and if there be any distinction among such, it is this, that he who is like that child, humblest and least, i. e. nearest to the spirit of his Lord, he is the greatest.

without connexion." De Wette, strangely enough: who also says, k. hs ear ene bét. is borrowed from Matt. x. 40; and that δ γὰρ μικρ. οὖτος ἔσται ought to stand at the beginning of the discourse, as in Matt. I quote this as one among continually recurring specimens of the criticism which would cut our precious, and most truthful Gospels into fragments without meaning or connexion. We live in times when such criticisms are making way among shallow minds: let the student judge from the above sample, what they are generally worth. Schleiermacher has some excellent remarks on this discourse and the circumstances, Essay on Luke. translation, pp. 159-162. 49, 50.] On the connexion of this answer with the preceding, see on this answer with the preceding, see on Mark. It is even more strikingly brought out here. Our Lord had declared the absolute equality of all sent in His name—and that if there were any difference, it was to be made by a deeper self-renouncing. Then arises the thought in the mind of the ardent son of Zebedee, of the exclusive and peculiar dignity of those who were thus sent, the antoronous and he relates what they had done, as a proof of his fully appreciating this exclusive dignity.

The link to what has preceded, is in the words $\epsilon \pi i \tau \hat{\phi}$ ov. $\sigma o u$. . . see the rest in Mark.

51-CHAP. XIX. 28.7 INCIDENTS DUR-ING THE LORD'S LAST JOURNEY TO JERU-SALEM. We now enter upon a long and most important portion of our Gospel, peculiar in this form, and most of it entirely peculiar, to Luke. At ch. xviii. 15 he again joins the narrative of Matt. and Mark within a few verses of where he parted from them. Respecting this portion, I will observe, without entangling myself in the harmonistic maze into which most of the interpreters have ventured, (1) that the whole of it is to be understood here as belonging to our Lord's last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem: see below on ver. 51. (2) that evidently that journey was not a direct one (see ch. x. 1; xiii. 22, 31; xvii. 11; xviii. 31, and notes), either in time or in the road chosen. (3) that in each of the two other Gospels there is a journey placed at this very time, described Matt. xix. 1, μετῆρεν ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας και ῆλθεν εἰς τὰ ὅρια τῆς Ἰουδαίας πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, and Mark x. 1, έκείθεν άναστας έρχεται είς τα όρια της 'Ιουδ. καλ πέραν τοῦ 'Ιορδάνου,which, in their narrative also, is the last o here only τ. $(-\lambda a \mu \beta \acute{a}) = \frac{1}{(-\lambda a \mu \beta \acute{a})} + \frac{1}{(-\lambda a \mu \beta \acute{a$ journey from Galilee to Jerusalem. (4) that in John x. 22, we find our Lord at Jerusalem, at the feast of dedication, in the winter (about the end of December), without however any hint as to how or whence He came there. (5) that the whole time between that feast and His Passion is spent thus:—After the attempt to stone Him, John x. 31, He retired to Bethany beyond Jordan; -was summoned thence by the message from Martha and Mary to Bethany near Jerusalem, where He raised Lazarus; -again retired to Ephraim, somewhere beyond Jericho, on the borders of the desert ;-six days before the passover came to Bethany, and the anointing took place, &c.; this whole time being three months and a few days. (6) I believe then that we have obtained a fixed critical point in all the four Gospels for the last journey from Galilee, after which He never returned (in the flesh) thither again. And this last journey was to the feast of dedication, or at all events brought Him in time for that feast (for it does not look like a journey specially to a feast) at Jerusalem. It was between the feast of tabernacles in John vii. 2, to which He went up privately (ib. ver. 10), and the occasion when we find Him in Solomon's porch, John x. 22. (7) The three first Evangelists relate nothing of the being in Jerusalem at the feast of dedication, or indeed at all, except at the last passover. We therefore find in them nothing of the retirements to Bethany (beyond Jordan) and Ephraim; but the removal of our Lord from Galilee to the confines of Judæa through the parts beyond Jordan is described as uninterrupted. (8) We are now I believe in a situation to appreciate the view with which our Evangelist inserts this portion. He takes this journey, beginning its narrative at the very same place where the others do, as comprehending—as indeed in strict historical fact it did-the last solemn farewell to Galilee (ch. x. 13-15), the final resolve of our Lord to go up to Jerusalem (ix. 51), and,

—which in its wider sense it did,—all the records which he possessed of miracles and discourses between this time and the triumphal entry. (9) As to arranging or harmonizing the separate incidents contained in this portion, as the Evangelist himself has completely by his connecting words in many places disclaimed it (see ch. ix. 57; x. 1, 25, 38; xi. 1, 14; xii. 1; xiii. 1, 10, 22; xiv. 1, 25; xv. 1; xvii. 1, 5, 11, 20; xviii. 1, 9),—I do not suppose that we, at this distance of time, shall succeed in doing so. The separate difficulties will be treated of as they occur.

51.] συμπλ., not past—not, when the days were fulfilled; but, were being fulfilled: i.e. approaching their fulfilment. 'When the time was come,' E. V., is too strong: when the days were come would be better, for that would include the whole of the journey in those days. See reff. ἀνάλημψις can have but one meaning (which, as the word itself is not found elsewhere, must be determined by the sense of the cognate verb: see reff.), His assumption, i.e. ascension into heaven. ἡμέρας τῆς ἀναλήψεως αὐτοῦ λέγει τὸν καιρὸν τὸν ἀφορισθέντα μέχρι τῆς ἀναλήψεως αὐτοῦ τῆς ἀναλήψεως ἀντοῦ τῆς ἐς εἰς οὐρανόν. mean something more, surely, than to provide board and lodging; there is a solemnity about the sentence which forbids that supposition. It must have been to announce the coming of Jesus as the Messiah, which He did not conceal in Samaria, as in Judæa and Galilee, see John iv. 26; and the refusal of the Samaritans must have been grounded on the jealousy excited by the preference shewn for the Jewish rites and metropolis.

They expected that the Messiah would have confirmed their anti-Jewish rites and Gerizim temple, instead of going up solemnly to Jerusalem, and thereby con-demning them. 54.] The disciples whom He named 'sons of thunder,' Mark iii. 17. They saw some insult of manner, or actual refusal to allow the Lord to enter their village. That a collision of this kind did take place is plain from the last verse, and implied from the occasion alluded to by the two Apostles, where the fire was invoked in the presence of the offending persons. It happened also in Samaria. πῦρ, not lightning, but fire, as in the passage alluded to, and in 1 Kings xviii. 38. It is exceedingly difficult to determine the true reading in this passage, which seems to have been more than usually tampered with, or wrongly written. It is hardly conceivable that the shorter text, as edited by Tischdf., . . . αναλώσαι αὐτούς; στραφείς δε επετίμησεν αὐτοῖς. καὶ ἐπορεύθησαν . . . should have been the original, and all the rest, insertion. Homœoteleuton may have had some share in the omission of the latter debated portion, from KAIEII to KAIEII: but this does not touch ώς και 'Ηλ. ἐπ. It has been suggested that those words may have been removed as involving indirect censure of Elias: but surely this lay too far off to create any offence. And their insertion into the text is quite inexplicable. In this great uncertainty, I have thought the candid way is to let my edited text reflect such uncertainty, and I have therefore printed these latter debatable words in the same type as the text, and have annotated on them. Let it be remembered that in both cases, versions far more ancient than our oldest MSS. contain these words. 55. | Γούκ οίδατε οίου πνεύματός έστε. Besides the mistaken ways of explaining these words of our Lord (e.g. 'Do you not see what a (bad) spirit you are shewing?' Bornemann) there are two senses which they may bear. (1) Affirmative, as in E. V., - 'putatis vos agi Spiritu tali quali olim Elias . . . sed erratis. Habetis quidem (ηλον sed οὐ κατ' ἐπίγνωσιν, et qui proinde humani est affectus, non divinæ motionis.' Grot.; or (2) interrogative- 'Know ye not what manner of spirit ye belong to (are of) !' the spirit meant being the Holy Spirit. 'The Spirit in Elias was a fiery and judicial spirit, as befitted the times and the character of God's dealings then; but the Spirit in Me and mine is of a different kind -a spirit of love and forgiveness.'

The latter of these is perhaps better suited to the context: but we seem to want an example in the Gospels of (οὐκ) οἴδατε used interrogatively : see Matt. vii. 11 || ; xx. 22, 25 ||; xxiv. 42 ||; xxv. 13; xxvi. 2: Mark iv. 13 (doubtful, but the construction is direct): ch. xii. 56: John viii. 14; xiv. 4 al. I have therefore punctuated according to the former sense: which, indeed, seems more naturally followed by the γάρ of the clause following. is very interesting to remember that this same John came down to Samaria (Acts viii. 14-17) with Peter, to confer the gift of the Holy Spirit on the Samaritan believers.

57—62.] Matthew (viii. 19—22) relates the contents of vv. 57-60, but at a totally different period of our Lord's ministry, viz. His crossing the lake to go to Gadara. It is quite impossible to decide which Evangelist has placed the incidents in their proper chronological place. When we once begin to speculate on such things, it is easy to find a fitness, on whichever side of the argument we range ourselves. Only (see notes on Matt.) we must not adopt the wretched subterfuge of the harmonists, and maintain that the two events took place twice, each time consecutively, and each time with the same reply from our 57, 58.] See notes on Matt.

The answer of our Lord again seems to refer to the sending out into the harvest (ch. x. 2), for which the present seventy were as it were the ploughmen, first breaking up the ground. plained simply from agricultural operations—for he who has his hand on the plough, guiding it, must look on the furrow which his share is making—if he look behind, his work will be marred. Hesiod's precept is very similar, ἔργ. ii. 60, ἰθείην αὔλακ' ἐλαὐνοι, μηκέτι παπταίνων μεθ' ὁμήλικας ἀλλ' ἐπὶ ἔργω θυμὸν ἔχων. εὔθετος, not 'fit,' but well adapted, 'the right sort of workman.' The sense is more immediately applicable to the ministry of the gospel of Christ, which will least of all things bear a divided service and backward looks,—but of course affects also every private Christian, inasmuch as he too has a work to do,—ground to break, and a harvest to reap.

CHAP. X. 1—16.] MISSION OF THE SEVENTY. It is well that Luke has given us also the sending of the Twelve; - or we should have had some of the Commentators asserting that this was the same mission. The discourse addressed to the Seventy is in substance the same as that to the Twelve, as the similarity of their errand would lead us to suppose it would be. But there is, as Stier has well remarked (iii. 89, edn. 2), this weighty difference. The discourse in Matt. x. in its three great divisions (see notes there), speaks plainly of an office founded, and a ministry appointed, which was to involve a work, and embrace consequences, co-extensive, both in space and duration, with the world. Here, we have no such prospective view unfolded. The whole discourse is confined to the first division there (vv. 1—15), and relates entirely to present duties.

Their sending out was not to prove and strengthen their own faith, as Hase supposes (Leben J. p. 194),-but to prepare the way for this solemn journey of the Lord, the object of which was the announcement of the near approach of the kingdom of God,-and the termination of it, the last events at Jerusalem. Their mission being thus temporary, and expiring with their return, it is not to be wondered at that we hear nothing of them in the Acts. This last is surely an absurd objection to bring against the historic truth of their mission, seeing that the Acts are written by this same Evangelist, and the omission is therefore an argument for, and not against, that truth. μετά ταῦτα-chronological-after these things, not 'besides these things,' as Schleiermacher and Olsh. render it. ανέδ., an official word: see reff.

aνεό, an official word: see refi. Bleek has observed, that δ κύριος, of our Lord, in narration, is peculiar to St. Luke, and to narrations which he alone gives. Cf. ch. vii. 13; xi. 39; xii. 42; xiii. 15; xvii. 5, 6; xviii. 6; xxii. 31, 61. But this is only true of the Synoptic Gospels. It occurs in the fragment at the end of St. Mark (xvi. 19), and in John (iv. 1 reff.). In the Acts, the usage is very general: see ii. 47; v. 9, 14; ix. 1, &c.; and in St. Paul's Epistles: see 1 Cor. vi. 14, 17; vii. 10, &c. [καl] êr. έβδ., not other seventy also,' but others [also], seventy in number. The exépous may refer, either to the Twelve, ch. ix. 1, or perhaps, from the similarity of their mission, to the ἄγγελοι in ch. ix. 52. But perhaps the first is more probable, from the similarity of the discourses.

The number of seventy might perhaps have reference to the seventy elders of Israel, Exod. xxiv. 1: Num. xi. 16:all sorts of fanciful analogies have been found out and insisted on (and moreover forced into the text), which are not worth recounting. où for oî,-see reff.

2.] See Matt. ix. 37 and notes. If ἐκβάλλη were read, the pres., as usual, would have the force of the continually repeated act: as it is, the aor. (as in | Matt.) indicates the whole mission, considered as one great act. 3, 4.7 The time was now one of greater danger than at the mission of the Twelve; therefore ver. 3 is bound immediately up with their present sending, whereas in Matt. x. 16 it regards a time yet distant in the future; also one requiring greater haste,—which accounts for the addition, μηδένα κ. τ. δδ. ἀσπ. These reasons also account for merely the healing the sick being enjoined, ver. 9. 6. viòs elp., & (or more probably, the, -as words like πατήρ, μήτηρ, viós, &c., are often definite though anarthrous) son of peace: i.e. persons receptive of your message of peace;—see reff. 7—12.] See on of peace;—see reff. 7—12.] See on Matt. x. 11—15. and notes. 17-24.] RETURN OF THE SEVENTY. As in ch. ix. 6-10, Luke attaches the return of the Seventy very closely to their mission. They probably were not many days absent. They say nothing of the reception of their message,—or it is not brought out in the Gospel, as not immeters. diately belonging to the great central object of narration; they rejoice that more power seems to be granted to them than even His words promised, seeing that He commissioned them only to heal the sick, not to cast out devils, as He did the Apostles, ch. ix. 1. That this was a ground of joy not to be prominently brought forward, is the purport of our Lord's answer; the whole of which as far as ver. 24 incl. is in the strictest connexion, and full of most weighty and deep 17. The ἐν τῷ ὀν. σου is perhaps too much lost sight of in the huiv here; though I would not lay so much stress on this as Stier has done.

18.] This verse has been generally misunderstood, and its force lost, by imagining it to refer to some triumph just gained, which our Lord announces as the reason for their newly manifested power. The truth is, that in this brief speech He sums up proleptically, as so often in the discourses in John, the whole great conflict with and defeat of the Power of evil, from the first even till accomplished by His own victory. The ἐθεώρ. τ. σ. refers to the original fall of Satan, when he lost his place as an angel of light, not keeping his first estate; which fall however had been proceeding ever since step by step, and shall do so, till all things be put under the feet of Jesus who was made lower than the angels. And this ἐθεώρουν belongs to the period before the foundation of the world when He abode in the bosom of the Father. He is to be (see ver. 22) the Great Victor over the Adversary, and this victory began when Satan fell from heaven. (I would not altogether erase the foregoing interpretation: but surely it is grammatically more correct, with Bleek, to refer the imperfect to the time just past,-to the Lord's prophetic sight at the time of the ministering of the Seventy. Cf. Acts xviii. 5 for a similar imperfect. If this view be correct, the words do not refer to any "triumph just gained," but to the Lord's glorious anticipations of final triumph, felt during the exercise of power by His servants.) ώς ἀστ. of the fall, but the brightness of the fallen Angel is thus set forth. The description is not figurative, but literal; i. e. as far as divine words can be said to be literal, being accommodated to our sensuous conceptions. See on this verse, Isa. xiv. 9-15, to which the words have a reference; and Rev. xii. 7-12.

19.7 Our Lord here,-including all the evil and poison in nature in the δύναμις τοῦ ἐχθ.,-from the power given Him over that enemy, asserts the gift to them, extended afterwards to all believers (Mark xvi. 18), of authority to 'bruise the head of the serpent' (Gen. iii. 15). There is an evident allusion to Ps. xci. 13. The connexion is- 'seeing that the power which I grant to you is so large, arising from my victory over the enemy,-make not one particular department of it your cause of joy, nor indeed the mere subjection of evil to you at all-but this, - the positive and infinite side of God's mercy and goodness to you, that He hath placed you among His redeemed ones. τὰ πνεύμ. is something different from τὰ δαιμόνια in those words above, and denotes a wider range of influence-influence over spirit for good-whereby the mvevματικὰ τῆς πονηρίας are subjected to the believers in Christ. Τhe ἐγγέγραπται έν τοις οὐρανοίς is an expression in various forms frequent in Scripture, and is opposed to έπλ της γης γραφήτωσαν, Jer. xvii. 13, said of the rebellious. But no immutable predestination is asserted by it;—in the very first place where it occurs, Exod. xxxii. 32, 33, the contrary is implied, see Ps. lxix. 28: Isa. iv. 3: Dan. xii. 1: Phil. iv. 3: Heb. xii. 23: Rev. iii. 5; xiii. 8; xx. 12, 15. The τὰ ὀνόμ. ὑμ. seems to be a reference to ἐν τῷ ὀν. σου above, which perhaps was with them a medium of self-praise, as so often with Christians. Our Lord says, 'the true cause of joy for you is, not the power shewn forth by or in you in My Name, but that you, your names, are in the book of life'-as testified by the πνευμα which συμμαρτυρεῖ τῷ πν. ἡμῶν ὅτι ἐσμὲν τέκνα θ εοῦ, Rom. viii. 16. And this brings us to ver. 21, where our Lord rejoices in the revelation of these things even to the babes of the earth by the will and pleasure of the Father:—these things—not, the power over the enemy—but all that is implied in ἐγγέγραπται ἐν τ. οὐρ. This, which is the true cause of joy to the believer, causes even the Saviour Himself to triumph, anticipating Isa. liii. 11. The words τῷ ἀγίφ cannot well be excluded from the text; the expression as thus standing, forms an ἄπαξ λεγ., but is agreeable to the analogy of Scripture: cf.

Rom. i. 4: Heb. ix. 14: 1 Pet. iii. 18: see also Rom. xiv. 17: 1 Thess. i. 6. The ascription of praise, and the verses following, are here in the very closest connexion, and it is perfectly unimaginable that they should have been inserted in this place arbitrarily. The same has been said of their occurrence in Matt. xi. 25; and, from no love of harmonizing or escaping difficulties, but from a deep feeling of the inner spirit of both discourses, I am convinced that our Lord did utter, on the two separate occasions, these weighty words; and I find in them a most instructive instance of the way in which such central sayings were repeated by Him. It was not a rejoicing before (in Matt.), but a confession: compare the whole discourse and notes. That the introductory words έν αὐτῆ τ. ὥρα, = έν έκ. τῷ καιρώ, may have been introduced from one passage into the other, and perhaps by some one who imagined them the same, I would willingly grant, if needful; not that, in the presence of such truths, such a trifle is worth mention, but that the shallow school of modern critics do mention, and rest upon such. On vv. 21, serving here the gradual narrowing of the circle to which our Lord addresses himself, ver. 22, στραφ. πρ. τ. μ., - then ver. 23 the same, with κατ' ίδίαν added.

23. This verse should not be marked off from ver. 22 by a new paragraph, as is done in the E. V.: much less, as in the Gospel for the 13th Sunday after Trinity, joined with what follows: except perhaps that the lesson taught us by its occurring there is an appropriate one, as shewing us how the grace of Christian love, which is the subject of the following parable, fulfils and abounds over, legal obedience. It is in connexion with the preceding, and comes as the conclusion after the thanksgiving in ver. 21. A similar saying of our Lord occurs Matt. xiii. 16, 17, but uttered altogether on a different occasion and in a dif-24. προφ. κ. ferent connexion. βασ.] David united both these, also Solomon. There may be an especial reference to the affecting last words of David, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1-5, which certainly are a prophecy of the Redeemer, and in which he says, ver. 5, "This is all my salvation, and all my desire, though he make it not to grow:"-see also Gen. xlix. 18.

25-37. QUESTION OF A LAWYER: THE PARABLE OF THE GOOD SAMARITAN. Peculiar to Luke. As Stier remarks (iii. 101, edn. 2), it is well that Luke has related the other incident respecting an enquiry of the same kind, for the critics would be sure to have maintained that this incident was another report of Matt. xix. 16. Such clear cases as this should certainly teach us caution, where no such proof is given of the independence of different narratives: and should shew us that both questions addressed to our Lord, and answers from Him, were, as matter of fact, repeated.

See however a case to which this remark does not apply, ch. ix. 57 ff. No immediate sequence from ver. 24 is νομικός, a kind of scribe, = νομοδιδάσκαλος, ch. v. 17-whose especial office it was to teach the law, see Titus iii. 13; = είς των γραμματέων, Mark xii. 28.

There is no reason to suppose that the lawyer had any hostile intention towards Jesus,-rather perhaps a self-righteous spirit (see ver. 29), which wanted to see what this Teacher could inform him, who knew so much already. Thus it was a tempting or trying of Jesus, though not to entangle Him: for whatever had been the answer, this could hardly have followed. τί ποιήσας] He doubtless expects to hear of some great deed; but our Lord refers him back to the Law of which he was a teacher. 26. πως αν.; A common Rabbinical formula for eliciting a text of Scripture.

 $\pi \hat{\omega}_{S}$ is not merely = τl , but implies how? i. e. to what purport; so that the answer should contain a summary of his reading in the Law. The first part of this, together with Deut. xi. 13 ff., the Jews had written on their phylacteries, and recited night and morning: but not the second; so that Kuinoel's idea that Jesus pointed to the phylactery of the lawyer, will not hold.

Meyer thinks the man answered thus, because he had before heard our Lord cite these in connexion, and with an especial view to asking the question vis έστίν μου πλησίου; It may have been so; - but I should rather believe the same spirit with which he began, to have carried him on to this second question. The words θέλ. δικ. έαυτ. seem to imply this, but see below. 29. Meyer explains this: The questioner, having been by our Lord's enquiry, πωs αναγ., himself thrown into the position of the answerer, yet, $\theta \in \lambda \omega \nu$ $\delta \iota \kappa$. $\epsilon \alpha \nu$., wishing to carry out the purpose with which he asked at first, and to cover what otherwise would be his shame at being answered by so simple a reply, and that his own,-asks τίς έστίν μου πλησίον;-Ι may observe that we need not take the whole of this explanation, but may well suppose that δικαιώσαι έαυτ. may mean, 'to get himself out of the difficulty:' viz. by throwing on Jesus the definition of δ πλησίον, which was very narrowly and technically interpreted among the Jews, excluding Samaritans and Gentiles.

30.] ὑπολ., taking him up, implies that the question was made an occasion of saying more than the mere answer. See Herod. vii. 101: Thucyd. κατέβ., both because Jerusalem was higher, and because 'to go up' is the usual phrase for journeying towards a metropolis. ἀπὸ Ἱερ. εἰς Ἱεριχώ, about 150 stadia distant. The road passed through a wilderness (Josh. xvi. 1) which was notorious for the robberies committed there. "Arabas quæ gens, latrociniis dedita, usque hodie incursat terminos Palestinæ, et descendentibus de Hierusalem in Hiericho obsidet vias, cujus rei et Dominus in Evangelio recordatur." Jerome, Comment. on Jer. iii. 2, vol. iv. p. 857. The same Father mentions that a part of the road was so infamous for murders, as to be called the red or bloody way, and that in his time there was a fort there garrisoned by Roman soldiers, to protect travellers (De locis Hebræis, under Adommim, vol. iii. p. 150). exactly fell among. The Law and Prophets enjoined the act of mercy which this priest refused (see Exod. xxiii. 4, 5: Deut. xxii. 1-4: Isa. lviii. 7); not, it is true, literally,-and therefore he neglected it. "The form συγκυρία is uncommon: Polybius has συγκύρημα and -ρησις." great difference between the Samaritan and the others ;-the actions which follow are but the expansion of this compassion.

čλαιον κ. olvov These were usual remedies for wounds in the East: Galen, cited by Wetstein in loc., prescribes thus for a wound in the head, έλαίας φύλλα τὰ άπαλώτατα τρίψας παράχει έλαίου καλ οίνου μέλανος και κατάμασσε:-see also ἐπὶ τὸ ἴδ. κτ., thereby denying himself the use of it. is rarely found in the sing. in the classics: see an instance, Herod. ii. 132.

πανδοχείον The Attic form, as in the cognate words ίεροδόκος, ξενοδοκείν, δωροδόκος, &c., is πανδοκείον. So Phryn.: οἱ διὰ τοῦ χ λέγοντες ἁμαρτάνουσιν διὰ γὰρ του κ χρη λέγειν πανδοκείον κ. πανδοκεύς κ. πανδοκευτρία:-- p. 307, where see Lobeck's note. This is the only place where an inn, as we understand the word, a house for reception of travellers kept by a host as distinguished from an empty caravanserai, is mentioned. The Rabbinical writers frequently speak of such, but under a name adopted from this word, פונדק (Wetstein). Bleek remarks that this serves to shew, that there were such inns in that neighbourhood, though certainly they were not frequent.

36.] It will be observed that our Lord not only elicits the answer from the questioner himself, but that it comes in an inverted form. The lawyer had asked, to whom he was to understand himself obliged to fulfil the duties of neighbourship? but the answer has for its subject one who fulfilled them to another. The reason of this is to be found,-partly in the relation of neighbourship being mutual, so that if this man is my neighbour, I am his also; -but chiefly in the intention of our Lord to bring out a strong contrast by putting the hated and despised Samaritan in the active place, and thus to reflect back the δμοίως more pointedly. "Observe γεγονέναι, to have become neighbour. The neighbour Jews became strangers, the stranger Samaritan became neighbour, to the wounded traveller. It is not place, but love, which makes neighbourhood." Wordsworth. 37. πορεύου, κ.τ.λ.] The rendering is as stress, the πορεύου being only secondary.

The student accustomed to look at all below the surface of Scripture, will not miss the meaning which lies behind this parable, and which--while disclaiming all fanciful allegorizing of the text-I do not hesitate to say that our Lord Himself had in view when He uttered it. All acts of charity and mercy done here below, are but fragments and derivatives of that one great act of mercy which the Saviour came on earth to perform. And as He took on Him the nature of us all, being 'not ashamed to call us brethren,' counting us all His kindred,—so it is but natural that in holding up a mirror (for such is a parable) of the truth in this matter of duty, we should see in it not only the present and prominent group, but also Himself and His act of mercy behind. And thus we shall not (in spite of the scoffs which are sure to beset such an interpretation, from the superficial school of critics) give up the interpretation of the Fathers and other divines, who see in this poor traveller, going from the heavenly to the accursed city (Josh. vi. 26: 1 Kings xvi. 34),-the race of man, the Adam who fell ;-in the robbers and murderers, him who was a murderer from the beginning (John viii. 44); -in the treatment of the traveller, the deep wounds and despoilment which we have inherited from the fall; -in the priest and the Levite passing by, the inefficacy of the law and sacrifice to heal and clothe us: Gal. iii. 21 (Trench remarks, Parables, p. 316, note, edn. 4, that the Church, by joining the passage Gal. iii. 16-23 as Epistle, with this Parable as Gospel for the 13th Sunday after Trinity, has stamped this interpretation with her approval):-in the good Samaritan, Him of whom it was lately said, "Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?" (John viii. 48) who came to bind up the broken-hearted, to give them the oil of joy for mourning (Isa. lxi. 1 ff.);—who for our sakes became poor, that we through His poverty might become rich: who, though now gone from us, has left with us precious gifts, and charged His ministers to feed His lambs, promising them, when the chief Shepherd shall appear, a crown of glory that fadeth not away (1 Pet. v. 2, 4). Further perhaps it is well not to go; -or, if we do, only in our own private meditations, where, if we have the great clue to such interpretations, -knowledge of Christ for ourselves, and a sound mind under the guidance of His Spirit,-we shall not go far wrong. But minutely to allegorize, is to bring the sound spiritual interpretation into disrepute, and throw stumbling-blocks in the way of many, who might otherwise arrive at it.

38—42.] ENTERTAINMENT OF OUR LORD AT THE HOUSE OF MARTHA AND MARY. It surely never could be doubted who this Martha and Mary were, nor where this took place,—but that the harmonizing spirit has so beclouded the sight of our critics. Bengel believes them not to be the sisters of Lazarus, but another Martha and Mary somewhere else;—and this in spite of the deep psychological identity of characters which meets us in John xi. xii.

Greswell, still more strangely, believes the persons to be the same, but that they had another residence in Galilee, and endeavours to establish this from John xi. 1 (where he says ἀπό only indicates residence, ἐκ origin; and the κώμη is not Bethany, but the village in Galilee: see notes there). I shall, as elsewhere, take the text in its most obvious and simple interpretation, and where nothing definite is inserted in it, throw light on it from what we know from other sources. And I believe most readers will agree with me in taking these for the sisters of Lazarus, and the village for Bethany. "As regards the name Martha, it is in Aramæan מרתא, from מר dominus, and answers to the Greek κυρία." Bleek. 38.] ἐν τῷ πορ. need make no difficulty—the whole of the events related in this section of the Gospel are allotted, as in the widest sense they belonged, to the last journey of our Lord from Galilee, which ended in the triumphal entry into Jerusalem: see note on ch. ix. 51 ff. Jesus, as we know that He afterwards did, so now probably, when at Jerusalem (at the feast of Dedication), abode at Bethany. He 'loved'-(only used in this sense by John with regard to this family, and to himself)-Martha and Mary and Lazarus-and this word implies surely hospitality and interγυνή τις—it does not follow that Martha was a widow; the incident brings out the two sisters, and therefore no others are mentioned. She may have had a husband or a father living. At all events, it is a consistency belonging to real life, that we find the same person prominent in the family in John, as here.

39.] It does not appear that the meal had begun; far rather is it likely that Martha was busy about preparing it. Mary sat at Jesus' feet, as His disciple, while He was discoursing. 40. περιεσπ. (as also the form παρακαθεσθείσα above) is a word of later Greek. We have in Dion. Hal. ix. 43, περισπά περί τὰς έξω στρατείας τον δημον: and in Jos. Antt. v. 1. 4, πρός τοσαύτας ύπηρεσίας διασπώμενος. See also Diod. Sic. i. 74: Polyb. xv. 3. 4. It exactly answers to the Latin 'torqueor' used in the same connexion by Horace, Sat. ii. 8. 67, and to a midland provincial expression 'to be put about,' meaning to be 'distracted with officious care.' See Phryn. ed. Lobeck, n. 415, who gives ἄσχολος είναι for the corresponding classical expression. generally, but not always, used by Luke of a sudden coming into presence. and most obvious meaning, indicated that simpler preparation would have been all that was needful, but the molla leads to the ev, and that to the avadn uspis, the εν being the middle term of comparison between the natural mode and the spiritual ἀγαθή μερίς. So that the whole will imply-only within the circle of Christ's disciples, those who act from love (mistaken or otherwise) to Him-much as John vi. 27,-and will set before us the bread which perisheth on one hand, and that which endureth to everlasting life on the other. The ayath μερίς, the good portion, is the ev which is needful—see John vi. 53,-the feeding on the bread of life by faith; which faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the βημα χριστοῦ, which Mary was now receiving into her soul, and which (John vi. 54) shall never be taken away, but result in ever-lasting life. The two types of character have ever been found in the Church; both, caring for Him, and for love to Him doing what they do: but the one busy and restless, anxious and stirring; the other quiet and humble, content to sit at His feet and learn. We see here which of the two He praises. But on the other hand we must not derive any argument hence against an active Christian life of doing good: this is, in fact, to sit at His feet and learn-to take His yoke on us, and learn of Him. It is the bustling about the $\pi \circ \lambda \lambda \dot{\alpha}$ of which there is no need, which is blamed: not the working out the fruits of the Spirit, which are needful, being parts themselves of the ayabh uepis.

CHAP. XI. 1-13.] JESUS TEACHES THE DISCIPLES TO PRAY. The locality and time of the following incident are alike indefinite. The only limits are those of the great journey which is the subject of this section. There is no reason for supposing this to be the only occasion on which the Lord delivered this prayer to His disciples. In the Sermon on the Mount, it stands in close connexion with what goes before; - and here also. In so weighty a summary of His teaching as that was, He was not likely, when speaking of prayer, to omit it; -- when asked by His disciples to teach them to pray, He was not likely to depart from the form once given them. Such are ordinary probabilities, antecedent to every question affecting the two Gospels: and those critics who throw aside all such, are far more prejudiced in reality, than those who allow them full weight. "The peculiar and abridged form in Luke," says Meyer, "is a proof that the apostolic Church did not use the Lord's prayer as a form." Rather, we may say, a proof of the fidelity with which our Evangelist reproduced his original reports, not correcting them as others after him did (see var. readd.) to suit the forms most probably in use. the apostolic Church did not use the Lord's Prayer as a form,—when did its use begin, which we find in every known Liturgy? (See Bingham, Antiqq. xiii. 7.) 1. xa0. x. 'Iw....] Of this fact we know nothing beyond the allusion here.

2.] ὅταν προς., λέγ. . . . , more definite than $o\~v\tau\omega s$ $\pi\rho\sigma s$ in Matt. On the prayer itself, see notes on Matt. vi. 9-13. The clauses not found in the text could hardly by any possibility have been omitted by any, had they ever formed a part of it. Stier's argument, that our text has not been conformed to Matt., because the doxology has never been inserted here, seems to me to tend in quite another direction: the doxology was inserted there, because that was the form in general liturgi. cal use, and not here, because this form was never used liturgically. καθ' ήμ.] for that day's need, or for that day, i. e. day by day. substantive need be supplied after 76.

This varied expression (see above) may serve to shew how far 'Luke's reporter' (De Wette) was from misunderstanding the words of the Lord; that reporter, as Stier well observes, (Reden Jesu, iii. 126, edn. 2,) being no other than the Holy Spirit Himself, whose special guidance was promised in bringing to mind the things said by Jesus (John xiv. 26). 5. Now follows a parable on continuing instant in prayer, of the same nature as that in ch. xviii. 2 ff. In both parables, the argument is 'à fortiori:' "if selfish man can be won by prayer and impor-tunity to give, and unjust man to do right, much more certainly shall the bountiful Lord bestow, and the righteous Lord do justice." Trench, Parables, in loc., who further remarks, that here intercessory prayer is the subject of the parable; there, personal. And, that we must remember that all reluctance on the part of God to answer our prayers is not real, but apparent only, and arises from deeper reasons working for our good: whereas the reluctance in these two parables is real, arising from selfishness and contempt of justice. The interrogative form continues to $\sigma o \iota$, ver. 7, 'Who of you shall be in these supposed circumstances ?' λέγω ὑμ. κ.τ.λ. 6. παρ. ἐξ ὁδ.] In the East it was and is the custom to travel late at night, for coolness' sake. Why τρείς ἄρτους, does not appear. I forbear to give the allegorical interpretations of the number, which abound: the significance of the

7.] We have an interesting fragment of domestic life here given us. The door is 'barred,' not only 'shut;' there is the trouble of unbarring it; the father and children are in bed (els 7. K. elo. ellipt. for 'have gone eis T. K., and are ev

8.] avaídera is too mildly rendered by 'importunity,' E. V. It should be shamelessness. It is presupposed here that the postulant goes on knocking and asking.

9.] What follows is in the closest connexion, and will not bear the idea that it is transferred here merely as being appropriate. The αἰτεῖν, ζητεῖν, κρούειν, all answer to the features of the parable. Ver. 10 declares to us not merely a result observable here among men, (in which sense it is not universally true,) but a great law of our Father's spiritual Kingdom: a clause out of the eternal covenant, which cannot be changed.

11-13.] Our Lord sets forth the certainty of our obtaining the Holy Spirit, (the unspeakable gift, in which all other δόματα ἀγαθά are included,) from our Father, by another 'à fortiori' argument, drawn from the love of earthly parents, so far less careful and tenderly wise than He is over His children. The construction, as before (ver. 5), is a mixed one: half interrogative, half hypothetical. For the rest, see notes on Matt. vii. 7 ff. The egg and scorpion are added here. The serpent and scorpion are the positively mischievous: the samples, ch. x. 19, of the δύναμις $\tau \circ \hat{v} \in \chi \theta \rho \circ \hat{v}$:—the stone, that which is simply unfit for food. So that God's answers to our prayers consist of neither useless nor mischievous things, but of His best gift-His Holy Spirit-in all the various and fitting manifestations of His guidance and consolation and teaching in our lives. This is (because this takes of and imparts to us by leading us continually to Him who is) the άρτος of the parable;—the 'paterfamilias' is our Father in Heaven, with whom however the night is as the day, who never slumbers nor sleeps. It has been noticed how by the hungry traveller coming to the man, may be imported, in the depth of the parable, the awakening in a man's own soul (which is so precious to him) of that hunger which he has nothing to satisfy, and which none but God can satisfy. The student may, as in the foregoing parable, follow out this clue for himself (provided it be done soberly) with much interest and profit.

that when we address God (Matt. vi. 9), He is δ πατηρ δ έν τ. οὐρ.—when He answers us, He is ὁ πατηρ ὁ ἐξ οὐρ. In the former case we go up into Him and His abode; in the latter He comes down to us. The construction is not (Meyer) δ ἐν οὐρανῷ ἐξ οὐρ. δώσει: but the one so common in good Greek, δ έκ Πελοποννήσου πόλεμος, denoting the quarter whence the influence implied in the substantive comes, which here is the result of that relation implied in πατήρ.

14-36. Accusation of casting out DEVILS BY BEELZEBUB, AND DEMAND OF A SIGN FROM HEAVEN. OUR LORD'S DISCOURSE THEREUPON. Matt. xii. 22—45. Mark iii. 23—30. The reasonings of Greswell to shew that Luke relates an entirely different incident from Matt. and Mark, able and well conducted as they are, fail to carry conviction to my mind. The marks of identity are too many and striking to be mistaken; and on the plan of discrimination which he has adopted, I am persuaded that we might prove four distinct Crucifixions and Resurrections to have happened just as easily. Besides, it is quite impossible to carry the hypothesis throughout this section of Luke's Gospel: and when it has been once given up, a considerable difference is made in the way of regarding the various narrations. On the side of which Evangelist the strict accuracy lies, it is next to impossible for us now to decide. I am inclined to think with Schleiermacher (transl., p. 190), that the section from ch. xi. 14-xii. 53 (or rather perhaps 59) is a connected whole, or, at all events, is intended to form such. But then the whole is introduced (ver. 14) without any mark of connexion with the preceding, and terminated as abruptly. On the other hand, the narrative in Matt. is introduced by his usual τότε, following upon a very general description of a retirement of our Lord, and His being pursued by multitudes, all of whom He healed; but whether the oi οχλοι are the same, and the τότε meant to specify that this incident occurred then and there, is by no means certain. Nor is the close of the section (xii. 50) bound very closely to xiii. 1, which commences έν τη ημέρα ἐκείνη, and can hardly be said with certainty to define the very same natural day. We may observe that the attendant circumstances, as introduced and closed in Mark iii. 20; iv. 1, are equally indeterminate. I therefore leave the difficulty where I found it, and where I believe it will ever remain, during our present state of imperfection; only observing, that the important incident and discourse grounded on it is no way thereby invalidated in authority. It seems to have been a portion of the evangelic history, the position of which was not exactly and satisfactorily fixed; of which there have been already some instances (see ch. ix. 57-62), and there are, as will be seen, yet more as we proceed.

16. This is not mentioned here by Matt., but further on in the discourse, ver. 38. No distinction (Gresw.) can be drawn between σημ. and σημ. έξ ούρ., for (1) our Lord answers the demand in both places by the same reply, the sign of Jonas, - see also Matt. xvi. 1-4; and (2) the ordinary Jewish idea attached to σημ. would imply έξουρ.,—see notes on Matt. xvi. 1. 17. είδώς] So Matt. also, ver. 25.

20.] ἐν δακτύλφ θ. = ἐν πνεύματι No distinction can be established, as Gresw. attempts. The one expression explains the other. What was done (Hebraistically speaking) by the finger of God, was done by the Spirit of God. We have much greater variations than this in sayings demonstrably the same. And as to what the same author maintains about the relative magnitude of the works of the finger, hand, and arm of God, a reference to ref. Ps., where the heavens are 'the works of Thy fingers,' will sufficiently shew how little reliance is to be placed on such subtleties.

21. This parabolic sentence is in close connexion with many prophetic sayings, Isa. xl. 10 marg.; liii. 12, and most pointedly Isa. xlix. 24, 25. It will be remembered that the Baptist called the Lord by this name, δ ισχυρότερος-placing after it, it is true, µov, but still using it as indicative of the Almightiness of the Son of God, rather than in comparison with him-The loxupos is the adversary, Satan; his auli, this present world,-

John xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11. His goods, or tools, or spoils, -τὰ ὑπάρχοντα = τὰ σκεύη = τὰ σκῦλα,—are the sons of men,-2 Tim. ii. 26: 1 John v. 19 (Greek). With these is he clothed and armed, or rather with their evil capacities, which he furbishes and brightens for his use: with the πανοπλία τοῦ διαβόλου, compare by way of contrast, the $\pi \alpha \nu \sigma \pi \lambda i \alpha \tau o \hat{\nu} \theta \epsilon o \hat{\nu}$, Eph. vi. 11—20. Without these arms and tools he would be powerless: the evil one must have evil men-something receptive of evil-to work upon. But these the ioxvρότερος takes from him, and divides his spoils, Isa. liii. 12. He divides his spoilsturns to His own use and that of His followers all that good which the enemy had corrupted into evil. Stronger had already come into the strong man's house—the Saviour, into the world-and was robbing him of his captives, and making them into His own disciples—e.g. Mary Magdalene and others: but the work was not fully completed yet, till the Lord, by and in His death, overcame him that had the power of death, i.e. the devil. And that His great victory is still proceeding;—He is still taking from him one and another,-rescuing the sons of men by the power of His gospel, till the end, when He shall (Rev. xx. 1 ff.) bind him in the abyss; and though he be loosed for the final conflict by His sufferance, shall cast him overthrown into the lake of fire for ever. Rev. xx. 14. 23.7 See on Matt. ver. 30. 24-26.7 27, 28.7 This See on Matt. xii. 43. little but most instructive incident, here interposed, serves to shew the originality of Luke's account, and that, whatever its position may be, it is itself of the highest authority. The woman apparently was influenced by nothing but common-place and unintelligent wonder at the sayings and doings of Jesus :- and she broke out, with true womanly feeling, into a blessing of the mother who bare such a wonderful Teacher. Such seems to be the account of the incident itself. Lord's reply is indeed wonderful: - (1) In reproof. He corrects in her the unapprehensiveness of his word, which had caused her to go no further into the meaning of it than this ordinary eulogy imported,-and gives her an admonition how to profit better by it in future.

(2) In humility. He disclaims all this kind of admiration for his humanity: and says not 'my word,' but the word of God, which is in fact the same, but takes the view off from Him in his abasement, unto the Father who sent Him.

(3) In truth. He does not deny the honour hereby pronounced upon his mother, but beautifully turns it to its true side-viz. that which was given her long since-μακαρία ή πιστεύσασα, ch. i. 45. Her blessedness consisted not so much in being His mother, as in her lowly and faithful observance of the word of the Lord spoken to her: see ch. ii. 19, 51. Nor again does He deny that to have borne Him was an honour—µèv oùv is 'imo vero'—' yes, indeed, but.' (4) In prophetic discernment. It will be seen that this answer cuts at the root of all Mariolatry, and shews us in what the true honour of that holy woman consisted,in faith and obedience. As the mother of the Lord, she represents our human race, unto whom a child is born, a son is given; no individual exclusive honour is due to her, any more than to Cornelius, who was singled out from the Gentile world, and honoured by an angelic message relative to the divine purposes:-if she were, as there is every reason to conclude she was, a believer in her Son, the Son of man, she bore Christ in a far higher and more blessed sense than by being His mother in His humanity. And this honour may all believers in Him partake of with her; therefore the Lord says not h άκούουσα τ. λ. but οἱ ἀκούοντες. The last and boldest perversion of these words of our Lord by Father Newman, viz. that He thus does but still further exalt her honour, in that, besides being His mother, she heard His word, and kept it, need only be mentioned, to shew the follies to which able men are abandoned, who once desert truth and simplicity.

33-36.] Our Lord goes on to speak of His teaching and miracles, which this generation despised, and demanded a sign from heaven in preference; He tells them that they will not see the significance of them, because they shut the eyes of their understanding, which should be the light of the soul ;-this is set before them in a parable concerning the light of the body, which is the outward eye. The sentences are repeated from the Sermon on the Mount, see Matt. v. 15; vi. 22 f. (where see notes on all that is common), and ch. viii. 16; but, as has been shewn, the truth shines from a different side of them here. 33.] κρύπτην (for so it should be accentuated), a crypt, or covered passage; την απόκρυφον οίκίαν, Euthym. Athenœus, v. 205, describing a splendid ship built by Ptolemy Philopator, speaks of a κρύπτη φραγμοῖς καὶ θυρίσι περιεχομένη πάντοθεν.

of the state against which they are cautioned :- σκόπει μη δ νους ό φωταγωγός της ψυχης σου σκοτισθη ύπο των παθών, 36.] "Tautological: the Euthym. second member contains the same assertion as the first." (De Wette.)-Let us examine this. 'When thine eye is single (ver. 34),i. e. simple,-straight and single-seeing,thy whole body will be light.' Then (ver. 36),- 'if this be so,-if thy whole body be light, having no part dark,-then it shall all be light as when a lamp with its brightness illuminates thee.' Of what is our Lord speaking? Of His teaching, as apprehended by the simple, single-seeing soul. If then the soul be so, -having no part darkened by prejudice or selfish lusts, and approach thus to His teaching, it shall be wholly illuminated by it, as by the candle of the Lord, searching its inward parts. So this saying, which, even as it stands, is not tautological,-for the second clause expresses the further result and waxing onward of the shining light, arising from the singleness of the eye,-becomes, in its spiritual significance, a weighty declaration of truth, answering to ch. viii. 15:-see also John viii. 12.

PHARISEES. There can be no antecedent improbability in the supposition that our Lord spoke on various occasions, and with various incidental references, the component parts of that great anti-pharisaic discourse contained in Matt. xxiii. That was spoken in the temple, during the last week of His ministry; it formed the solemn close of His public teaching, - and at the end of it He departed out of the temple to return no more. I do not think it possible to suppose any part of that discourse in Matthew to be related otherwise than in its true place; all probability is against such an idea, - and so is the character of the reports of discourses in that Gospel, in general so strictly coherent and exact. There is then but one supposition left, unless we suppose Luke to have put together at random a number of fragments, and to have inserted them here, creating an occasion for them (for it amounts to this), which is equally inconceivable. And that is, that our Lord spoke at this meal, the occasion being the wonder of the Pharisce at His not washing before sitting down to meat, parts of that discourse, with which He afterwards solemnly closed His public ministry. See throughout, notes on Matt. 37.] apiστήση, the morning xxiii. εἰςελθ. δὲ ἀνέπεσεν, i. e. without any delay; as soon as He had entered, He sat down. 38.] The expression of this wonder is not stated, but is probable. Our Lord would hardly have so suddenly begun, ὑμεῖς οἱ Φ., unless something had been said, to which by assent they were parties. See His proceeding when nothing was said,—ch. vii. 39, 40.

εβαπτ...] This use of the word shews that it did not imply ne-

sees washed before meat. 39.] There is not the least improbability or incongruity in our Lord's having thus spoken as a guest at a meal (as Strauss, Schleiermacher, De Wette, &c., maintain); -His solemn work of reproof and teaching was never suspended out of mere compliment, -nor were the intentions of the Pharisees towards Him so friendly as these invitations seem to imply. They were given mostly from deference to popular opinion, and from no love to Him; -sometimes even with a directly hostile object. See vv. 53, 54, and compare also ch. vii. 44-46. Observe also, that the severest parts of the discourse in Matt. (vv. 13 -22, 33) were not uttered on this occavũv, i. e. as instanced by your present conduct-Here is an instance of your, &c. τοῦ ποτ. κ. τ. πίν.] Understand, 'in the proverb'-or perhaps the application is left to be enthymematically filled up, for the next clause presupposes it. τὸ ἔξωθεν and τὸ έσωθεν of a man, are not the outside and inside of the body—but the outside apparent conduct, and the inner unseen motives. Some difficulty has been found in the parallelism of τδ έξωθεν τοῦ ποτηρίου κ. πίνακος, and τὸ ἔσωθεν ὑμῶν: and a proposal has been made (to which I am surprised to see Bleek giving his adhesion) to take bull with what follows: "the inside (of the cup and platter) is full of your plunder and wickedness." But surely all verisimilitude is against this, as well as the emphatic position thus given to buw. The simple fact is, that the parable and its interpretation are intermixed throughout the whole, the mind of the hearer being left to find its own way in allotting each its part. Ver. 40 seems clearly to me to be a quesτ = Matt. xi. οὐχ ὁ ποιήσας hì τὸ ἔξωθεν καὶ im τὸ ἔσωθεν ἐποίησεν ; ABCDE 22 reif. Judg. 41 τ πλὴν τὰ s ἐνόντα δότε t ἐλεημοσύνην, καὶ ἰδοὺ πάντα Μετ νχ. tion, and to mean, as E. V., Did not He, who made the outside, make the inside also?-i. e. if His works have become unclean and polluted through sin, what is the use of only partially purging them,not accomplishing the purgation ?-must not the cleansing, to be good for any thing, extend to the whole? The making of ποιήσας to mean, 'he who has cleansed,' and a negative, instead of an interrogative sentence-'ye fools, he who has cleansed the outside has not cleansed the inside also'-gives, especially as the same was more strongly implied in ver. 39, the most frigid sense imaginable; and I can only (still, after his second edition) wonder that Stier, after Kuinoel and others, 41.] Here should have adopted it. again I am compelled entirely to differ from Stier, who, with Erasmus, Lightfoot, Kuinoel, Schleiermacher, &c., understands this as ironical-'but ye give alms of their contents, and behold, all things are clean (in your estimation) to you.' But (1) this is inconsistent with the imperative δότε. (2) It would require ἐκ τῶν ἐνόντων, for the Pharisees did not give Tà evorta in this sense. (3) It would be altogether irrelevant to the matter in hand, which was reproof to the Pharisees for their care about outward cleanliness, when the inside was left unclean. (4) It would be inconsistent with the emphatic position of Ta evorta, which are thus pointed out as the true material, out of which to give alms. It would be altogether contrary to our Lord's usual habit of speaking about giving alms, to make Him cast a slur on it, as this would do: see Mark x. 21: ch. xii. 33, where the expression is very similar to this. The command is a rebuke for their covetousness (see ch. xvi. 14), which follows in close connexion with apπαγή and πονηρία, ver. 39. The τὰ ἐνόντα are the contents of the vessel, which vessel (ver. 39: see note above) is umeis: = therefore, in its meaning, the Tà ύπάρχοντα of ch. xii. 33, - and the πάντα καθαρά έστιν answers to the θησαυρός έν ουρανώ of that verse, the result of which is the καρδία ἐν οὐρανῷ: and such persons being καθαροί τῆ καρδία,—to them, as τοῖς καθαροῖς, πάντα καθαρά (Titus i. 15). 42.] But woe unto you, for ye do not this .- but make the most trifling payments, &c. nexion, which is thus so close, is quite destroyed by the ironical interpretation of ver. 41. See note on Matt. xxiii. 23.

43.7 Matt. xxiii. 6, 7. There doubtless was ample illustration of this at the time and place when it was spoken.

44. See Matt. ver. 27; -but here the point of comparison is different. There (see note) the sepulchres are whited, that men may not pass over them unawares: and the comparison is to the outside fairness, and inside abomination. Here, the graves are not seen, and men thinking they are walking on clean ground are defiled by passing over them. Perhaps the difference of expression may have been occasioned by the greater wealth and splendour and display of the Pharisees in the metropolis, where Matt. xxiii. was spoken. ανθρ. οί περ. έπ., the men who walk over them . . .; of $\tilde{a}\nu\theta\rho$. $\pi\epsilon\rho$. $\tilde{\epsilon}\pi$., men, when they walk over them. 45.] This man appears to have been not a common Pharisee merely, but besides, a νομικός, whose duty it especially was to interpret the law. Perhaps he found himself involved in the censure of ver. 42; or gene-

See on We have here a remarkable variation of expression in ver. 49, ή σοφία του θεού είπεν here = έγώ Matt. Various explanations have been given of this. The difficulty is not the variation just noticed, so much as that no such passage exists in the O. T. But I have little doubt that the true explanation is this:—the whole saying is a reference to 2 Chron. xxiv. 18-22, and so marked a one, that I am surprised no Commentators but Olshausen and Stier should have observed it, and they not thoroughly. That passage opens with remarks of the sacred historian on the delinquency of Judah and Jerusalem after the death of Jehoiada the priest: then ver. 19, ' He sent prophets to them, to bring them again to the Lord; and they testified against them: but they would not give ear. And the Spirit of God came upon Zechariah the son of Jehoiada the priest, which stood above the people, and said unto them And they conspired against him, and stoned him with stones at the commandment of the king in the court of the house of the Lord. . . . And when he died, he said, The Lord look upon it, and require it.' The words in our text are not indeed a citation, but an amplification of ver. 19 there—a paraphrase of them, giving the true sense of what the wisdom of God intended by them ; - enlarging the mere historical notice which laid hold of God's purpose only by one thread let down to the earth, into the divine revelation of the whole purpose of God as the counsel of His will in heaven. In Matt. the Lord Jesus Himself, as became the solemnity of that final and awful close of His testimony to His own who received Him not, stands forth as the doer of this work, the sender of the Prophets and Apostles. (On 'son of Barachias' see on Matt. ver. 35.)

Perhaps the strangest solution of the difficulty above noticed is that of Meyer (second ed.), who supposes the words to have been inserted here from Matthew, and introduced as a quotation by $\dot{\eta} \sigma o \phi$. τ . θ. είπεν, which Luke puts into the mouth of Jesus Himself, lagt bier Jefum felbft Bleek attributes the fact of our Lord having made this event the terminus historicus of their murders of the prophets to the position of the books of Chronicles at the end of the Hebrew Canon: and uses it as a proof that they then held the same place as now.

Matt. ver. 14, which words are the best explanation of our text:-the key of knowledge (i. e. not of, as admitting to, knowledge-but the key is the knowledge), being that right understanding of the Law and Prophets, which should shew Him to the people, of whom they testified; this the expounders of Scripture had taken away, neither themselves entering, nor permitting those to enter who were otherwise doing so,—and thus shutting the kingdom of heaven in men's faces.

CHAP. XII. 1—12.] WARNING AGAINST HYPOCRISY. A discourse spoken immediately or very soon after the former, and in connexion with it; -consisting for the most part of sayings repeated from other occasions, and found nearly verbatim in Matt. It is impossible that there should be any reasonable doubt of this view, when we remember that some of them have appeared before, or appear again, in this very Gospel. While our Lord was in the house of the Pharisee, the multitudes appear to have assembled together again. If so, ev of will mean, during which things, viz. those related above. comes forth to them (ch. xi. 53) in the spirit of the discourse which He has just completed, and cautions his disciples against that part of the character of the Pharisees which was most dangerous to them. The connexion of these twelve verses may be thus enunciated :- Beware of hypocrisy (ver. 1), for all shall be made evident in the end (ver. 2), and ye are witnesses and sharers in this unfolding of the truth (ver. 3). In this your work, ye need not fear men; for your Father has you in His keeping (vv. 4—7)—and the confession of my name is a glorious thing (ver. 8), but the rejection of it (ver. 9), and especially the ascription of my works to the evil one (ver. 10), a fearful one. And in this confession ye shall be helped by the Holy Spirit in the hour of need (vv. 11, 12).

1. πρῶτον]
I am not convinced by Olsh., De Wette, and Meyer, that this belongs to mposex. Every instance which they quote of πρώτον being thus used, is where some definite matter is subsequent to the thing said or done; e.g. Matt. vi. 33. But here is no such matter: $-\pi \rho$, would only mean, 'earnestly,'-'be sure that you' . . . which meaning I do not think it bears. I have therefore coupled it with rous \u00ed. avr.,

13-21.] ANSWER TO ONE WHO SOUGHT A DIVISION OF HIS INHERIT-ANCE. Peculiar to Luke. 13. The man was evidently not a disciple, nor preparing to be one (as Schleierm. thinks), but some hearer in the crowd, whose mind had been working in him during our Lord's last sayings about the care of Providence for His friends, and he thought this was just the care his circumstances wanted; being, as appears, oppressed by his brother in the matter of his patrimony. Possibly too he had an idea that the Messias, or the great Rabbi to whom he was listening, was come to set all things right; -and with that feeling which we all have of the surpassing injustice of our own wrongs, broke out with this inopportune request.

14.] ἄνθρ., a word of solemn reproof: see Rom. ii. 1; ix. 20. The ανθρ. also forms a definite subject for vuas to refer to, ... 'men,' i.e. mankind in general. This question is expressed in almost the very words of the Egyptian rejecting the arbitration of Moses, Exod. ii. 14; -and may shew us the essential difference of the two offices of Moses and

A very striking similarity is found in Sir. xi. 18, 19, έστι πλουτών από προςοχής καί σφιγγίας αὐτοῦ, καὶ αὕτη ἡ μερὶς τοῦ μισθοῦ αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ εἰπεῖν αὐτον Εὖρον ἀνάπαυσιν, καὶ νῦν φάγωμαι ἐκ τῷν άγαθων μου, καὶ οὐκ οἶδε τίς καιρός παρελεύσεται, καὶ καταλείψει αὐτὰ έτέροις και ἀποθανείται. Stier thinks this a convincing proof that our Lord did occasionally refer to the Apocrypha (?).
20.] God said unto him,—perhaps it is meant, by some unmistakable judgment; but more likely, as occurring in a parable, the words are to be literally taken. By supposing merely a divine decree to be meant, without personal communication, as Grotius, Kuinoel, and Trench do, we lose the impressive part of the parable, where the man's selfishness and folly is brought into immediate contact with the solemn truth of his approaching death, which certainly our Lord intends us to ἄφρων, opposed to his contemplate. worldly prudence; — ταύτη τῆ ν. to the ἔτη πολλά; — the ψυχή in the one case, at its ease, eating, drinking, and making merry, to the ψυχή in the other, demanded, rendered up, judged. αἰτοῦσιν, not strictly impersonal; there are those whose business it is, even the angels, the ministers of the divine purposes: see ch. vi. 38 and note. The merely impersonal sense may be defended: cf. ver. 48: but this saying seems so solemn, as to require something å ήτοίμασας, which thou madest ready; but not for thyself.

Meyer endeavours to evade the force of this, by supposing it addressed only to the Apostles and then existing disciples. But it is said to the μικρον ποίμνιον, who are all the elect people of God. This is the true way of investing worldly wealth:- 'He that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord.' See on Matt. vi. 19-21.

connected with ver. 32-'since your Father hath seen fit to give you the kingdom, be that kingdom, and preparation for it, your chief care.' There are continual points of similarity, in this part of the discourse, to Matt. xxiv. 42 ff., but no more: and the close connexion quite forbids us to imagine that the sayings have been collected merely by the Evangelist. 35. There is a slight reference to, or rather another presentation of the truth set forth in, the parable of the virgins, Matt. xxv. 1 ff. But the image here is of servants waiting for their Lord to return from the wedding; -left at home and bound to be in readiness to receive him. There is only a hint at the cause of his absence-he is gone to a wedding: γάμοι may mean almost any feast or entertainment-and the main thought here only is that he is away at a feast, and will return. in turn to each. Compare the washing of the disciples' feet in John xiii. 1 ff., which was a foreshewing of this last great act of self-abasing love. 38.7 Olsh. observes that the first watch is not named, because the marriage itself falls on it: but his view that because the fourth is not named, our Lord follows the ancient custom of the Jews and divides the night into three watches, is probably incorrect: it is more likely (Meyer) that the fourth is not named, because the return was not likely to be so long delayed;—for the decorum of the parable. 39.] I am surprised that Schleiermacher can have imagined (transl. p. 198) that this verse has been inserted so as to break the connexion, and by a later hand. Nothing can be more exact and rigid than the connexion as it now stands. Our Lord transfers, to shew the unexpected nature of his coming, and the necessity of watchfulness, the relation between Himself and the servants, to that between the thief and the οἰκοδεσπότης. For the purposes of this verse, they represent the οἰκοδεσπότης—collectively, as put in charge with the Lord's house and household (thus the verse is intimately connected with ver. 42) :- and in the further application, individually-each as the oikoδεσπότης of his own σκεύος, to be kept with watchfulness against that day:-He is represented by the thief-ίδου ξρχομαι ώς κλέπτης, Rev. xvi. 15; iii. 3. Olshausen's view, that the oirob. is the

out of keeping with the main features of the parable. That he should be put in the place of the watching servants (καὶ ὑμεῖς) seems impossible: besides that the mioros οἰκονόμος below is this very οἰκοδ., being such in the absence of his Lord, but the οἰκονόμος when He appears. την παρ. τ., not the two last verses (Stier), but the whole:-Who are they that are thus to wait and watch, and to be thus honoured at the Lord's coming? This question, coming in so suddenly and unconnectedly and remaining apparently unanswered, is among the many proofs of the originality and historic reality of this discourse (against De Wette, &c.).

42 ff. Our Lord does not answer the question directly, but proceeds with His discourse, so as to furnish it with an answer; -viz. that in its highest sense it applies to his Apostles and ministers, inasmuch as to them most has been given as the οἰκονόμοι - but that its application is gradationally downwards through all those who know their Master's will, even to the lowest, whose measure both of responsibility and of reward is more limited. For the comment on vv. 42-46 see on Matt. xxiv. 45-51. Notice that ἀπίστων here = ὑποκριτῶν in Matt.

47, 48.] Primarily, in reference to the question in ver. 41, οἱ γνόντες = ἡμεῖς, the disciples. οἱ μὴ γνόντες = πάντες, the multitude:—but the application is not limited to this: the truth is one of universal extent. The 47th verse needs little explanation :- after both πολλάς and δλίγας, πληγάς is to be supplied, see reft.: and cf. Aristoph. Nub. 959, $\epsilon \pi \epsilon \tau \rho l \beta \epsilon \tau \sigma$ τυπτόμενος πολλάς. $\epsilon \tau \sigma \iota \mu$, not $\epsilon \alpha \upsilon \tau \sigma \nu$, but, matters, $\pi \rho \delta s$ τ . θ . $\alpha \dot{\upsilon}$.: almost in the absolute sense of

'making ready:'-it refers back to the γίνεσθε ετοιμοι of ver. 40; this readiness being not only preparing himself, but the matters over which he has charge, ver. 35. There is reference to Deut. xxv. 2.

ὁ δὲ μη γν. The case is of one (a disciple in the first reference, but then generally of all men) who bona fide is ignorant of his Lord's will. That such persons shall be punished, is both the sentence of the law, see Levit. v. 17-19, and an inference from the truth set forth ver. 57, and Rom. i. 19, 20, 32; ii. 14, 15, -that the natural conscience would have prevented the μη ποιησαι. (Observe that the two classes, not included here, are & γνούς και ποιήσας, and δ μη γνούς και ποιήσαs, as far as that can be said (see Rom. ii. 14); - the reference here being only to the un ποιήσας in both cases, or rather to the $\mu \dot{\eta}$ π , in the first case and its equivalent π. ἄξια πληγῶν in the second.) But the difficulty seems to be to assign a spiritual meaning to the δαρήσεται olivas. That such will be the case, would à priori be consonant to the justice of the Judge of all the earth: and we have it here declared, that it shall be so: but how, is not revealed to us. It is in vain for the sinner to encourage himself in sin from such a declaration as this: for the very knowledge of the declaration excludes him from the exemption. "Our ears have heard the voice divine; We cannot be as they." (Christian Year.)

περισσ. Perhaps, more than from others: but more likely more than had been deposited with him, viz. that, and the interest of it: see Matt. xxv. 15 ff.

49-53. The connexion appears to be this:-the immense and awful difference between the faithful and unfaithful servants brings our Lord to the ground of that difference, and its necessary development in the progress of His kingdom on 49. πῦρ It is extraordinary that the official announcement of the Baptist (ch. iii. 16) - αὐτὸς ὑμᾶς βαπτίσει έν πν. άγ. καὶ πυρί-connected with the mention of a baptism here,-with the promise Acts i. 5, and the appearance Acts ii. 3, so strikingly expressed as διαμεριζόμεναι γλῶσσαι ώsel πυρός,— have not kept the Commentators in general (Bleek is an exception) from falling into the blunder of imagining here that the fire is synonymous with, and means no more than, the discord and division which follow. The fire is, the gift of the Holy Spirit,—the great crowning result of the sufferings and triumph of the Lord Jesus. To follow this out in all its references belongs to another place: see notes on Mark ix. 49, and Acts ii. 3. This fire, in its purifying and separating effects on the mass of mankind, causes the διαμερισμός afterwards spoken of.

The construction of Ti BEA. el 78. av. has been ever a matter of dispute, while the meaning is on all hands nearly agreed. The three prevalent explanations of it are: (1) which is Origen's (appy), and is adopted by Grot., and defended by Meyer [formerly] and Stier, —making $\epsilon i =$ είθε, and rendering, and what will I? would that it were already kindled! Certainly thus there is nothing forced in the construction; we have el for 'utinam' joined with agrist in Josh. vii. 7;—but the abrupt short ejaculation seems unlike the usual character of our Lord's discourses. It is true the structure of John xii. 27 affords an instance of a similar question, $\kappa \alpha l \tau l \in l\pi\omega$; ... and under similar circumstances, of His soul being troubled. (2) which Theophyl., Kuinoel, Olsh., De Wette, Bleek, &c. [so Meyer, edn. 5, see Moulton's Winer, p. 562, note 3] adopt, taking $\tau i = \omega s$, as some do, adopting that reading, in Matt. vii. 14 (but see note there), and $\epsilon i = \delta \tau i$, and rendering, How I wish that it were already kindled! But here we have serious difficulties of an idiomatic kind:-τί is apparently never thus usedand ei only after words of wondering, being grieved, &c.: see Mark xv. 44. That of Euthym., Beza, &c., and the E. V., 'What will I, if it be already kindled?' i. e. τί πλείον θέλω έὰν ἀνήφθη; τι πλεῖον ἀναμένω ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ; Euth. This also presents no constructional, but a very great contextual diffi-culty; for by ver. 50 it evidently was not yet kindled; and even if this were overcome, the expression, evidently a deep one of personal anxiety (and be it remem-bered Who said it), would be vapid and unmeaning in the extreme.

50.] The symbolic nature of Baptism is here to be borne in mind. Baptism = Death. The figure in the Sacrament is the drowning,-the burial, in the water, of the old man and the resurrection of the new man: see 1 Pet. iii. 20-22, and notes. The Lord's Baptism was His Death, in which the Body inherited from the first Adam (ἐν ὁμοιώματι σαρκός άμαρτίαs) was buried, and the new Body (τὸ σῶμα τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ) raised again: see Rom. vi. 1-11, but especially ver. 10. And He was straitened (the best possible rendering) till this was accomplished: -i. e. in anxiety and trouble The &é here implies, but of spirit. first, i. e. before that fire can be shed abroad. Here we have then, as Stier expresses it, a 'passio inchoata' of our Lord; the first utterance of that deep anguish, which afterwards broke forth so plentifully, -but coupled at the same time with holy zeal for the great work to be accomplished.

51-53.] The work of this fire, as it burns onward in the world, will not be peace, but division: see Mal. iii. 2, 3, 18; iv. 1, where we have the separating effect

54-59.] Reproaches for blind-ness to the signs of the times. The connexion of this with the foregoing is natural and close. ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν (ver. 52), the distinction shall begin to be made; - the discord and division between those who discern τον καιρόν τοῦτον (ver. 56) and those who do not. Our Lord then turns to the crowd (καί. He not only said to the disciples the foregoing, but also to the crowd the following) and reproaches them (1) for their blindness, in not being able to discern it, as they did the signs in the natural heavens; and (2) for their want of prudence (vv. 57-59), in not repenting and becoming reconciled to the law of God while yet there was time. Schleiermacher and De Wette can discover no connexion, and yet the latter thinks Luke inserted the sayings of vv. 54-56 out of Matt. xvi., because of vv. 49 ff. 54] There is a somewhat similar sceptre had departed from Judah;-the general expectation of the coming of the Messiah is testified even by profane authors;-the prophets had all spoken of Him, and the greatest of them, the Baptist, had announced His arrival.

57. In what follows, our Lord takes occasion from the request about the inheritance, which had begun this discourse, to pass to infinitely more solemn matters. There is, I think, no denying that the κρίνειν το δίκ. and the ὁ ἀντίδικός or. have a reference to that request, in the ability and duty of every man to 'judge what is right:'-but the sense of the words far outruns that reference, and treats of loftier things. 'Why do ye not discern of yourselves your true state—that which is just—the justice of your case as before God? You are going (the course of your life is the journey) with your adversary (the just and holy law of God) before the magistrate (God Himself); therefore by the way take pains (δος έργ., da operam a Latinism: there is no reference to interest of money, as Thl.,-who also has the other interpretation, -supposes) to be delivered from him (by repentance, and faith in the Son of God, see Ps. ii. 12), lest he drag thee to the judge (κριτής-who adjudges the case and inflicts the fine; that is, the Son, to whom all judgment is committed), and the judge deliver thee to the exactor (see Matt. xiii. 41), and the exactor cast thee into prison' (ditto, ver. 42).

59. See on Matt. v. 25, and, on λεπτόν, Mark xii. 42.

Peculiar to Luke. 1.] èv aйт. т. кагр. тау mean at that very time-viz. as He finished the foregoing discourse: but it is not necessary to interpret thus; -for, Matt. xii. 1; xiv. 1, the similar expression, ἐν ἐκείνφ τ. κ. is certainly indefinite.

παρ. ἀπαγγ., came with the news, not, as Stier supposes, 'were in the crowd, and remarked to the Lord concerning these Galilæans,' in consequence of what He had said ch. xii. 57:—such a finding of connexion is too fine-drawn, and is a fault which we may excuse in Stier, for his many services in interpreting our Lord's discourses, but must not imitate. It is obvious that no connexion is intended between this incident and the foregoing discourse. περί τ. Γ.] The historical fact is otherwise unknown. The way of speaking here shews that it was well known to the writer. It must have occurred at some feast in Jerusalem, on which occasions riots often took place (see Jos. Antt. xvii. 9. 3; 10. 2), and in the outer court of the temple. Such slaughters were frequent, and would not be particularly recorded by the historians. This mingling of their blood with their sacrifices seems to have been thought by the narrators evidence that they were very depraved sinners: for this π ἔμιξεν μετὰ τῶν θυσιῶν αὐτῶν. 2 καὶ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν π Matt xxvii. αὐτοῖς Δοκεῖτε ὅτι οἱ Γαλιλαῖοι οὖτοι ἀμαρτωλοὶ n παρὰ σίμι, n τοιαῦτα πε- n κτοιαῦτα τε- n πόνθασιν; 3 οὐχὶ λέγω ὑμῖν, ἀλλ' ἐὰν μὴ p μετανοῆτε, o κατι n πάντες ὁμοίως ἀπολεῖσθε. t ἢ ἐκεῖνοι οἱ δέκα [καὶ] p Matt. ii. p Matt. iii. p Matt. ii όκτω εφ' ους επεσεν ο q πύργος εν τω Σιλωάμ και άπ- q Matt. xxi. 33 έκτεινεν αὐτούς, δοκεῖτε ὅτι αὐτοὶ τοφειλέται ἐγένοντο - Matt. vi. n παρὰ πάντας τοὺς ἀνθρώπους τοὺς εκατοικοῦντας Ίερου- s constr., Matt. σαλήμ; 5 οὐχὶ λέγω ὑμῖν, ἀλλ' ἐὰν μὴ p μετανοήσητε, t Matt. xx. 5. πάντες t ώςαὐτως ἀπολεῖσθε. 6 ἔλεγεν δὲ ταύτην τὴν παρα- t ii. was their argument, and is unconsciously that of many at this day, - the worse the affliction, the more deserved:' see Gen. xlii. 21: Acts xxviii. 4. 2, 3. Our Lord perceives this to be their reasoning -they did not express it, as is plain by the δοκείτε ὅτι . . . He does not deny that all the Galilæans were sinners, and deserved God's judgments, but that these were pre-eminently so. The ouoiws (the force of which is lost in the E. V., 'likewise') should be rendered in like manner, as indeed the Jewish people did perish by the sword of the Romans. 4, 5. Our Lord introduces this incident as shewing that whether the hand of man or (so called) accidents, lead to inflictions of this kind, it is in fact but one Hand which doeth it all-Amos iii. 6. There is also a transference from the Galilæans-a despised people—to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, on whom the fulness of God's wrath was to be poured out in case of im-penitence. Of the incident itself, or of the tower in Siloam (probably the district in which the fountain, John ix. 7, was situated,-though on the whole matter, and the situation of the fountain itself, there is considerable uncertainty), we know nothing. Josephus says of the wall of the ancient city, πρδς νότον ύπερ την Σιλωάμ επιστρέφον πηγήν, B. J. v. 4. 2: see also Neh. iii. 15. In B. J. vi. 7. 2, he uses μέχρι τοῦ Σιλωάμ, as here, meaning apparently a district of the city: see on John l. c. λέται, sinners,—see Matt. vi. 12;—perhaps the same thought may be traced as pervading the saying, as in vv. 58, 59, of the last chapter. (No such idea as that the tower was a prison for debtors is for a moment to be thought of.) τως] See on δμοίως above, -similarly-in the ruin of your whole city. This does not render it necessary that these words should have been spoken to actual dwellers in Jerusalem: for nearly the whole nation was assembled there at the time of the 6-9.] This Parable has perhaps been interpreted with hardly enough reference to its own peculiar context, or to the symbolic language of Scripture in other places. Ordinarily (also in Trench, Par. in loc.) the owner of the vineyard is explained to be the Eternal Father: the dresser and intercessor, the Son of God: the fig-tree, the whole Jewish people: the vineyard, the world. But it may be objected to this, that the owner comes to seek the fruit, which can be properly said only of Him who els τὰ ἴδια ἦλθεν-who is even in Matt. δ κληρονόμος - and by implication there, the possessor of the vineyard ὅταν ἔλθη (for that destruction He universally represents as His coming). The other objections will come out in the direct exposition of the Parable, which I take to be this:—The link which binds it to the foregoing is έαν μη μετανοήτε . . . ; and it is addressed rather to individuals than to the whole nation-though of course to the whole nation as made up of individuals. The vineyard is not the evorld, which would be wholly inconsistent with Scripture symbolism (for Matt. xiii. 24 the comparison is to ή βασ. τ. οὐρ. -the gospel dispensation, in which the field-not the vineyard-is the whole world); but, as in Isa. v. 7, the house of Israel and the men of Judah (see notes on Matt. xxi. 33 ff.). The fig-tree planted in the vineyard -among the vines-(a usual thing) denotes an individual application, fixing each man's thought upon one tree -and that one, himself; just as the guest without the wedding-garment in Matt. xxii. He who had the tree planted in His vineyard (- 'All things that the Father hath, are Mine'-John xvi. 15), came seeking fruit, and found it not: see Matt. xxi. 19 and note. (The vinedresser, see below.) He commands it to be cut down, as encumbering the soil (exhausting it, rendering it inactive: see reff.); three years has He been coming and seeking fruit in this tree, and he findeth none. Then, at the intercession of the vinedresser, He consents (for this is implied) to spare it this year also, until it has been manured; if that fail, the Intercessor himself has no more plea to urge-it is to be cut down. Now who is this Intercessor? First look at the matter of fact. Who were the vine-dressers of God's vineyard? They were many. Moses, the Prophets, the Baptist, the Lord Himself, the Apostles and Teachers after Him. But what one Personality might be set forth as pervading all these, 'striving with man' in them all—as being δ ἀμπελουργός? Clearly, it seems to me, the Holy Spirit of God. In the passage just alluded to, Gen. vi. 3, we can hardly but recognize the main features of our present parable; especially when the Days of Noah are compared by the Lord Himself to His own coming to vengeance. The intercessory office of the Spirit (ὁ παράκλη-Tos, see on John xiv. 16), pleading with man and for man, and resigning that blessed conflict when met with inveterate obduracy, is often set before us in Scripture. (See the whole history of Saul; Zech. vii. 12-14: Prov. i. 23-32: Isa. lxiii. 10: Neh. ix. 20: Rom. viii. 26, 27.)

7. τρία ἔτη] I have little doubt (against Bleek, al.) that an allusion is intended to the three years of our Lord's ministry. The objection to this, that the cutting down ought then to have taken place at the end of τοῦτο τὸ ἔτος, does not apply; for all is left indefinite in the request and the implied answer. In the individual application, many thousands did bear fruit this very year; and of those who did not, who shall say when the Spirit ceased pleading with them, and the final sentence went forth? y. Kar. Why, besides bearing no fruit, is it impoverishing the soil [rendering the free of her muscles from the power which bound them down,-and then, ver. 13, the laying on of the divine hands confers upon her strength to rise and stand upright. It would be, in such a case, one thing to be loosed from the stiffening of years,and another to have strength at once conferred to stand upright. 14.7 The ruler speaks not either to Jesus or to the woman; but covertly and cowardly, to the multitude. Stier notices the self-stultification of this speech, in making $\theta \epsilon \rho a - \pi \epsilon \nu \epsilon \sigma \theta a \iota$, a reception of divine grace and help, a species of ἐργάζεσθαι. 15. ὑποκριταί] The Lord saw the real thoughts of his heart, that they were false, and inconsistent with his pretended zeal, and addressed the multitude as represented by him, their leader. A man hardly could give forth a doctrine so at variance with common sense and common practice, without some by-end, with which he covered his violation of truth. That by-end here was enmity to and jealousy of Jesus. The instance chosen exactly fits the circumstances. A beast tied to the manger is confined down as this poor woman was.

16.] The contrast is strongly drawn-between a dumb animal, and (not merely a human creature, but) a daughter of Abraham-one of the chosen people (I cannot see any necessity for a spiritual daughtership (Gal. iii. 7) being here implied), -between a few hours, since the last watering, and to these eighteen years' (compare ver. 7, ἰδοὺ τρ. ἔτ.).

17.] So far am I from thinking

a description of this kind to be a mere general close, put in by the Evangelist, that I would take it as an accurate and graphic account of the immediate effect of our Lord's power and irresistible words, and the following parables as spoken immediately thereupon, shewing the people the ultimate conquest which the Kingdom of God should obtain over all opposition,

After elseld, is to be supplied in both places, είς σωτηρίαν, or είς τ. βασ. τ. θεοῦ. This remark will dispose of the punctuation of Lachmann and Tischendorf in his earlier editions, who place only a comma at ἰσχύσουσιν, and connect it with ἀφ' οδ. 25. A reason why this ἀγωνίζεσθαι is so important:because there will be a day when the gate will be shut. The figure is the usual one. -of a feast, at which the householder entertains (in this case) the members of his family. These being assembled, he rises and shuts the door, and none are afterwards admitted. The ad' où extends to ¿στέ, end of ver. 25-and the second member of the sentence begins with TOTE. έξω έστάναι and κρούειν both depend on ἄρξησθε:-Hearing that the door is shut ye begin to stand without and knock. On the spiritual import, see note on Matt. xxv. 11.

ούκ οίδ. π. ἐστέ, 'ye are none of my family—have no relationship with me.' 26. ἐφάγ. ἐνώπ. σου κ. ἐπ.] As applied to the then assembled crowd, these words refer to the miracles of feeding,perhaps also to His having so often sat at meat in the houses of various persons (the κ. ἐπίομεν must not be pressed as meaning any thing different from ¿φάγ .:the expression is a general one for taking a meal) ;-as applied to Christians, to the eating and drinking whereof those miracles were anticipatory. Both these are èνώπιόν σου merely,-in His presence;very different from the drinking μεθ' ὑμῶν of which He speaks Matt. xxvi. 29, and from the δειπνήσω μετ' αὐτοῦ καὶ αὐτὸς μετ' ἐμοῦ, Rev. iii. 20. έν τ. πλ. ήμ. έδ., applicable directly to those to whom the words were spoken; and further, in its fuller sense, to all among whom the gospel is preached, even till the end. 27. ἐργάται ἀδικ.] This unusual expression seems to mean, persons engaged in the hire and receiving the wages of unrighteou-ness: see Matt. vii. 23, where οί έργαζόμενοι τ. ανομίαν answers to it. This meaning of έργάτης is peculiar: see reff. 28, 29.] See Matt. viii. 11, 12, The verses occur here in and notes.

a different connexion: 'Ye Jews, who neglect the earnest endeavour to enter now, shall weep and gnash your teeth when ye see all the saints, Jews and Gentiles, in the Kingdom of God, and yourselves excluded' (see ch. xvi. 23).

In these two verses is the real answer to the question of ver. 23 given :- 'they shall be MANY—but what is that to you, if you be not among them?' 30.] As the words here stand-somewhat different from those in Matt. xx. 16-they seem to be a prophetic declaration of what shall be in the course of the ingathering of these guests; -viz. that some who were the first, or among the first to believe, shall fall from their high place, and vice versa. This former has, as Stier notices (iii. 200), been remarkably the case with the Oriental Churches, which were the first founded and flourishing:—and, we may add, with the mother Church of Jerusalem, which has declined, while her Gentile offsets have flourished.

31-35.] WARNING OF HEROD'S EN-MITY; OUR LORD'S REPLY. Peculiar to Luke:—the apostrophe in vv. 34, 35 was spoken by our Lord also on another occasion, Matt. xxiii. 37-39. 31. Ev αὐτή τῆ ώρα is not necessarily definite.

These Pharisees appear to have been sent y Herod for the purpose of getting rid or Jesus out of his jurisdiction. sidering his character, it is hardly possible that he should really have wished to kill one who was so popular; -he refused to do so when Jesus was in his power afterwards in Jerusalem; -but, as great multitudes were now following Him about, and superstitious fears, as we know, agitated Herod, he wished to be quit of Him, and took this means of doing so. I think this view is necessary to justify the epithet applied to Herod, which certainly implies cunning on his part. Stier thinks the Pharisees invented the tale about Herod: but then how can the epithet applied to him be explained? I cannot for a moment believe, as he does, that our Lord saw through the lie of the Pharisees, and yet adopted it, meaning the ἀλώπηξ to signify themselves. "That Jesus in a public discourse uses such an expression of the ruler of his country, is not to be judged of by the manners, and ways of speech, of our times. The free-spokenness of the ancient world, which we meet with especially in the Hebrew prophets, allowed such strong expressions, without any thing peculiarly offensive being found in them." Bleek. 32, 33.] The interpretation of this answer is difficult, for two reasons-(1) that the signification of the σήμ., αυρ., and ή τρίτη is doubtful-(2) that the meaning of τελειουμαι is also doubtful. days mentioned are ordinarily supposed to be proverbially used; on His present working-auptor, for that between the present time and his arrival at Jerusalem-$\def_{\tau_0}$, for that arrival, and the end of his work and course by his Death. Against this, is (1) the positive use of the three days, in an affirmative sentence,of which no instance can be brought where the proverbial meaning is implied:—

(2) the πορεύεσθαι belonging to all three in ver. 33, whereas thus it only belongs to The interpretation the two first. adopted by Meyer (and Bleek) is this :-In three days (literal days) the Lord's working of miracles in Galilee would be ended, which had excited the apprehension of Herod: and then He would leave the territory, not for fear of Herod, but because He was going to Jerusalem to die. The objection to this is, that the sense-of ending these present works of healing, &c. does not seem a sufficient one for τελειου-Meyer takes it as middle-but qu., is a middle present ever thus placed alone? Is not such a form, when standing thus, necessarily passive? And though the word τελειούμαι is not found earlier than the writings of the Fathers in the sense of 'suffering martyrdom,' it is found in that of 'being perfected'-which, as applied to the Lord, included his Death :- see reff. I own that neither of the above interpretations satisfies me, -and still less the various modifications of them which have been proposed (e.g. by Stier and Wieseler; De Wette adopts none). Nor can I suggest any less open to objection :- but merely state my conviction, (1) that the days mentioned must have some definite fixed reference to three actual days: (2) that τελειουμαι is the pres. pass., and is used in the solemn sense elsewhere (reff.) attached to the word. If this Gospel had been a chronological calendar of our Lord's journey, the meaning would probably have been clear: but as we have none such, it is, and I believe must remain, obscure. Bp. Wordsworth's note is much to the point: "It must be remembered that Herod was ruler of Peræa as well as of Galilee: and that John the Baptist had been put to death at Macharus, where Herod had a palace, about ten miles E. of Jericho, and thirty E. of Jerusalem. St. Matt., xix. 1, and St. Mark, x. 1, 46, speak of our Lord being in Peræa, whence He passed over the river Jordan, and so came to Jericho, and thence to Bethany and Jerusalem for His Passion. Herod had put John to death not in Galilee but in Peræa: and if our Lord was now, as seems probable, in Peræa or near it, it was very likely that the Pharisees should endeavour to intimidate Him with a threat of Herod's anger." $\tau \hat{\eta} \in \mathbf{x} = \tau \hat{\eta}$ τρίτη above, and is not less precise (Stier). πορεύεσθαι, to journey-the very

There is no reference to the power of the Sanhedrim to judge and condemn false prophets (as Grot., Lightf., &c. think), for the fact of anoleoval only is here in question ;-and our Lord never would place himself in such a category 34, 35.] These verses are (Meyer). in too close connexion with the preceding to allow of the supposition that they are inserted unchronologically, as Grot., Mey., De W., Neander, and even Schleierm. suppose: and their variations from those in Matthew (xxiii. 37-39) are striking and

For γάρ, which there accounts for the ἐρημία of the temple, then for the last time left by our Lord, does not appear here, but δέ, introducing a fresh saying, having I believe another meaning: and the words ἀπ' ἄρτι, which follow Tonte there, marking that moment as the commencement of the dereliction, are here omitted. Surely these differences indicate an uttering of the words prophetically, previous to their utterance in the act of departure. he was set there by the Pharisees on purpose. This was before the meal (ver. 7). 5.7 There is a strict propriety in the comparison: the accident and disease are analogous. υίὸς ἡ βοῦς] This reading, which evidently was the original, seemed incompatible with the supposed argument à minori ad majus: vios was therefore altered to ovos (as in ch. xiii. 15) or $\pi\rho\delta\beta\alpha\tau\sigma\nu$ (Mill and Bornemann conjectured δis). But our Lord's argument is of another and a far deeper kind. The stress is on ὑμῶν: and the point of comparison is the ownership, and consequent tender care, of the object in question. 'Those who are in your possession and care, whether belonging to your families, or your herds, are cared for, and rescued from perishing: am I (the possessor of heaven and earth,—this lies in the background) to let mine perish without care or rescue?' There may be in the words the meaning 'son, or even ox;' but I prefer rendering them

7.] πρωτοκλ., see Matt. xxiii. 6, the middle place in the triclinium, which was the most honourable. At a large feast there would be many of these.

8.] The whole of this has, besides its plain reference, a deeper one, linked into it by the pregnant word γάμους, relating to the Kingdom of God. Both meanings are obvious, and only one remark needed;—that all that false humility, by which men put themselves lowest and dispraise themselves of set purpose to be placed higher, is, by the very nature of our Lord's parable, excluded: for that is not bona fide ταπεινοῦν ἐαντόν. The exaltation at the hands of the Host is not to be a subjective end to the guests, but will follow true humility.

12-14. The composition of the company before Him seems to have given occasion for this saying of our Lord. The Pharisee his host had doubtless, with the view (of watching Him) mentioned in ver. 1, invited the principal persons of the place, and with the intention of courting their favour, and getting a return. The Lord rebukes in him this spirit; -and it has been well remarked, that the intercourse and civilities of social life among friends and neighbours are here pre-supposed, (inasmuch as for them there takes place an ἀνταπόδομα, and they are struck off the list by this means,) with this caution, -that our means are not to be sumptuously laid out upon them, but upou something far better,-the providing for the poor and maimed and lame and blind. When we will make a sacrifice, and provide at some cost, let us not throw our money away, as we should if an ἀνταπόδομα is made to us in this world: but give it to the poor, i. e. lend it to the Lord; and then, as in ver. 14, there will be an ἀνταπόδ. ἐν τ. ἀναστ. τ. δικ., which shall not be a mere equivalent, but a rich reward. See an excellent note in 14.] ἀναστ. τ. δικ., the first resurrection, here distinctly asserted by our Lord; otherwise τ. δικ. would be vapid and unmeaning. 15-24. Parable of the Great Supper. One of the guests takes this literally, and imagines the great feast to which the Jews looked forward to be meant. He spoke as a Jew, and probably with an idea that, as such, his admission to this feast was sure and certain. Our Lord answers him by the parable following, which shewed him that true as his assertion was, (and He does not deny it,) the blessedness would not be practically so generally acknowledged nor entered into. Parable, whatever analogy it may bear with that in Matt. xxii. 1 ff., is wholly different from that in many essential points.

Also the excuses themselves are threefold. The first has his worldly possession ('one to his farm,' Matt. xxii. 5) to go and see: the second his purchase ('another to his merchandise,' ibid.) of stock to prove: the third his home engagements and his lust to satisfy. on in the journey, going forward, and speaking to the multitude on counting the cost before any man becomes his disciple.

26, 27.] See Matt. x. 37, 38, and note. The remark there made of the strangeness of this sound of the Cross, still applies: our Lord had not yet announced μισεί] It his death by crucifixion. is well to enquire what sense this word here bears. That no such thing as active hatred can be meant, is plain: our Lord himself is an example to the contrary, John xix. 25-27: the hate is the general, not personal, feeling of alienation in the inmost heart,—so that this world's relationships, as belonging to the state of things in this world, are not the home and rest of the This is evident from the έτι τε κ. τ. έαυ. ψυχήν which follows. Let the hate begin here, and little explanation will be further wanted. This addition also shews that the saying was not meant only for those times, in which more perhaps of the disruption of earthly ties was required, but for all time: for ἡ ἐαυτοῦ ψυχή is equally dear to every man in every age. It hardly need be observed that this hate is not only consistent with, but absolutely necessary to the very highest kind of love. It is that element in love which makes a man a wise and Christian friend, -not for time only, but for eternity. Beware of thinking, with Wordsw., that in εἶναί μου μαθητής, there is any emphasis on µov. Rather is it in the least emphatic place in the sentence, in order to throw all the stress on the verb είναι: cf. ἵνα γεμισθή μου δ οίκοs, ver. 23; καταφαγών σου τον βίον, ch. xv. 30. In ver. 33, the collocation is different, and $\mu o \nu$ has a secondary emphasis. See remarks on this idea of Wordsworth's, in note on Matt. xvi. 18.

28-30.] Peculiar to Luke. The same caution is followed out in this parable. This is to be borne in mind, or it will be misinterpreted. The ground of the parable is, that entire self-renuncia-tion is requisite, to become a disciple of Christ. This man wishes to build a tower: to raise that building (see 1 Cor. iii. 11-15), which we must rear on the one Foundation, and which shall be tried in the day of the Lord. He is advised to count the cost, to see whether he have enough thoroughly to finish it. If he begin, lay the foundation,-however seemingly well it may be done, it is not well done, because he has not enough to complete it: and the attempt can only lead to shame. So it is with one who would be Christ's disciple: but with this weighty difference, lying in the background of the parablethat in his case the counting the cost must always issue in a discovery of the utter inadequacy of his own resources, and the going out of himself for strength and 31-33. This same means to build. lesson is even more pointedly set before us in the following parable, which, as well as the other, is frequently misunderstood. The two kings here are, - the man desirous to become a disciple, to work out his salvation,-and GoD, with whose just and holy law he is naturally at variance; -it is his ἀντίδικος, see ch. xii. 58, and note: -these two are going to engage in war: and the question for each man to sit down and ask himself is, 'Can I, with (èv,-clad in,-surrounded by, all that I have, all my instrument of war) my ten thousand, stand the charge of Him who cometh against me with (μετά, being only as many as He pleases to bring with Him for the purpose, see Ps. lxviii. 17, E. V.) twenty thousand?'—see Job xv. 24—26. Here the inadequacy of man's resources is plainly set forth, not left, as in the former parable, to be inferred. Then, finding that he has no hope of prevailing, - ἔτι αὐτοῦ πόρρω όντος, while there is yet time,—he sends an embassy, and sues for peace, abandoning the conflict: throwing himself upon the mere mercy and grace of God; - άποτασσόμενος πάσιν τοίς έαυτοῦ ὑπάρχουσιν, in both cases. The ordinary misinterpretation of this parable is in taking the king with twenty thousand to be the ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου-which destroys all the sense :- for with him the natural man is at peace, but the disciple of Christ 31.] είς πόλ. belongs to συμβ., at war. not to πορευόμ. συμβαλείν πρός μάχην occurs Polyb. x. 37. 4 (the instance from Xen. The οὖν and καί, here restored to the text, are both valuable; the former as importing the recurrence of a saying known before, the latter as giving force to the suppo-sition. The salt, in Scripture symbolism, is the whole life-retaining antiseptic influence of the Spirit of God: -- this, working in the είναί μου μαθητής, is good: but if even this be corrupted - if the mere appearance of this, and not the veritable salt (which is the savour), be in youwherewith, &c.? Such a disciple is έξω βλητέος. Salt was not used for land, Ps. evii. 34, nor for mingling with manure; it is of no use for either of those purposes, but must be utterly cast out.

CHAP. XV. PARABLES, SETTING FORTH God's mercy to sinners. 1-7.] THE LOST SHEEP. It does not appear where or when this [gathering of publicans and sinners to hear him] happened,-but certainly in the progress of this same journey, and, we may well believe, consecutively on the discourses in the last chapter. This first parable had been spoken by our Lord before, Matt. xviii. 12-14: but, as Trench has remarked, (Par. in loc.,) with a different view: there, to bring out the pre-ciousness of each individual little one in the eyes of the good Shepherd; here, to shew that no sheep can have strayed so widely, but He will seek it and rejoice over it when found. The second is peculiar to Luke.

1.] ἦσαν ἐγγ., were busied in drawing near-were continually about Him, struck perhaps with penitence, -found, by His seeking them :- having come from the husks of a life of sin, to the bread of life; -so the three parables seem πάντες, a general term, admitting of course of exceptions, see ch. xiii. 33 and note. 2. προςδέχ., into His circle of adherents-ouverd .. allows them to sit at meat with Him :-on the journey, or at entertainments, as in Matt. ix. 10. Stier remarks (iii. 214, edn. 2) that this άμαρτ. προςδέχ. is an important and affecting testimony, from the mouth of the enemies of our Lord, to His willingness to receive sinners.

The διεγόγγ. implies either throughout the journey;—or rather, one to another, —responsively. 3—7.] The man having the hundred sheep, is plainly the Son of God, the Good Shepherd. This had been his prophetic description, and that in this very connexion,—of seeking the lost, Ezek. xxxiv. 6, 11 ff. This it is which gives so peculiar an interest to David as a type of Christ—that he was a shepherd: ibid, ver. 23. Our Lord plainly declares then by this parable—and that I take to be the reason why it is placed first (see below)—that the matter in which they had found fault with Him was the very pursuit most in accordance with his divine Office of Shepherd.

4.] It is the Owner Himself who goes to seek, see Ezek., ver. 11—God in Christ. The ἐκατὸν πρόβ. are the house of

on the part of the good Shepherd is, from the nature of the case, one of love: or, as Stier remarks, also human love for his own; for in Him, Love, and His glory, are one and the same thing.
καταλ. τὰ ἐνν.] These pass altogether into the background, and are lost sight of. The character of the good Shepherd is a sufficient warrant for their being well cared for. The ephus is not a barren place, but one abounding in pastures (John vi. 10, compared with Matt. xiv. 15). 5.] Not mere self-interest, but love comes forward here: see Isa. xl. 11. No blows are given for the strayingno hard words; mercy to the lost one,and joy within himself,-are the Shepherd's feeling; the sheep is weary with long wanderings,—He gives it rest. Matt. ix. 36; xi. 28. 6. In this return to His house, must be understood the whole course of seeking and finding which the good Shepherd, either by Himself or His agents, now pursues in each individual case, even until He brings the lost sheep home into heaven to himself-not in reality, so that it should not take place till the death of the penitent-but proleptically,-till the name is written in heaven; - till the sinner is penitent. This is clear from the interpretation in ver. 7. The φίλοι καὶ γείτονες = the angels (and spirits of just men made perfect?).

τὸ πρόβ. τὸ ἀπολωλός breathes a totally different thought from τ. δραχμήν ήν απώλεσα. There is pity and love in it, which, from the nature of the case, the other does not admit of. ύμῖν] In these words the Lord often introduces His revelations of the unseen world of glory: see Matt. xviii. 10.

On these δίκαιοι, see note at Matt. ix. 12, 13. They are the subjectively righteous, and this saying respects their own view of themselves. (Or if it be required that the words should be literally explained, seeing that these ninety-nine did not err, -then I see no other way but to suppose them, in the deeper meaning of the parable, to be the worlds that have not fallen; —and the one that has strayed, our human nature, in this our world.) But we have yet to enquire, what sort of sinner this parable represents: for each of the three sets before us a different type of the sinner sunk in his sin. Bengel, in distinguishing the three, says, 'Ovis, drachma, filius perditus-peccator (1) stupidus,-(2) sui plane nescius,-(3) sciens et voluntarius.' This one is the stupid and bewildered sinner, erring and straying away in ignorance and self-will from his Shepherd, but sought by the Shepherd, and fetched back with joy.

8-10.] THE LOST PIECE OF MONEY. In the following wonderful parable, we have the next class of sinners set before us, sought for and found by the power and work of the Spirit in the Church of Christ. It will be seen, as we proceed, how perfectly this interpretation comes out, not as a fancy, but as the very kernel and sense of the parable. The youn cannot be the Church absolutely, for the Church herself is a lost sheep at first, sought and found by the Shepherd. Rather is the olkía here the Churchas will come out by-and-by,-and the γυνή the indwelling Spirit, working in it. All men belong to this Creator-Spirit; all have been stamped with the image of God. But the sinner lies in the dust of sin and death and corruption-'sui plane nescius.' Then the Spirit, lighting the candle of the Lord (Prov. xx. 27: Zeph. i. 12), searching every corner and sweeping every unseen place, finds out the sinner; restores him to his true value as made for God's glory. This lighting and sweeping are to be understood of the office of the Spirit in the Church, in its various ways of seeking the sinner-by the preaching of repentance, by the Word of God read, &c. Then comes the joy again. φίλαι κ. γείτονες are invited-but there is no return home now-nor in the explanation, ver. 10, is there any ἐν οὐρανῷ, because the Spirit abides in the Churchbecause the angels are present in the Church, see 1 Cor. xi. 10:—nor is it ἔσται (as in ver. 7 at the return of the Redeemer then future), but Yivetai-the ministering spirits rejoice over every soul that is brought out of the dust of death into God's treasure-house by the searching of the blessed Spirit. In this parable then we have set before us the sinner who is unconscious of himself and his own real worth; who is lying, though in reality a precious coin, in the mire of this world, lost and valueless, till he is searched out by the blessed and gracious Spirit. And that such a search will be made, we are here assured. 11—32.] THE PRODIGAL SON. Peculiar to Luke. 'If we might venture here to make comparisons, as we do among the sayings of men, this parable of the Lord would rightly be called, the crown and pearl of all His parables.' Stier, iii. 227, edn. 2. We have here the glad and welcome reception of the returning sinner (sinner under the most aggravating circumstances) in the bosom of his heavenly Father: and agreeably to the circumstances under which the discourse was spoken, the δίκαιοι who murmured at the publicans and sinners are represented under the figure of the elder son: see below. The parable certainly was spoken on the same occasion as the preceding, and relates to the same subject. Bp. Wordsworth, who for the sake of upholding the patristic interpretation denies this, seems to me to have entirely missed the scope of the parable: see below. 11.] ανθ. τις—our heavenly Father, the Creator and Possessor of all: not Christ, who ever represents Himself as a Son, although frequently as a possessor or lord. vious, not, in any direct or primary sense of the Parable, the Jews and the Gentiles: that there may be an ulterior application to this effect, is only owing to the parable grasping the great central truths, of which the Jew and Gentile were, in their relation, illustrations,—and of which such illustrations are furnished wherever such differences occur. The two parties standing in the foreground of the parabolic mirror are, the Scribes and Pharisees as the elder son, the publicans and sinners as the younger; -all, Jews: all belonging to God's family. The mystery of the admission of the Gentiles into God's Church was not yet made known in any such manner as that they should be represented as of one family with the Jews;not to mention that this interpretation fails in the very root of the Parable; for in strictness the Gentile should be the elder, the Jew not being constituted in his superiority till 2000 years after the The upholders of this Creation. interpretation forget that when we speak of the Jew as elder, and the Gentile as younger, it is in respect not of birth, but of this very return to and reception into the Father's house, which is not to be considered yet. Bp. Wordsworth's objections (in loc.) do not touch the reasons here given. The relations of elder and younger have a peculiar fitness for the characters to be filled by them, and are I believe chosen on that account; νεώτερον δὲ ὀνομάζει τὸν ἄμαρτωλὸν ὡς νηπιφορονα καί εὐεξαπάτητον. Euthym. 12-20.] The part of the parable relating to the prodigal himself divides itself into three parts—1. his sin: 2. his misery: 3. his penitence. In vv. 12, 13 his sin is described. It consists in a desire to depart from his Father's house and control, and to set up for himself,-to live a life of what the carnal man calls liberty.

meant,-are considerably lightened by the consideration, that the contradiction of that assertion would have been beside the purpose of the parable; that it was the very thing on which the Pharisees prided themselves; that, besides, it is sufficiently contradicted in fact, by the spirit and words of the elder son. He was breaking his Father's commandment even when he made the assertion,-and the making it is part of his hypocrisy. The result of the Father's entreaty is left purposely un-certain (see Trench, Par. in loc.):—is it possible that this should have been the case, had the Jewish nation been meant by the elder brother? But now, as he typifies a set of individuals who might themselves be (and many of them were) won by repentance, -it is thus broken off, to be closed by each individual for him-For we are all in turn examples of the cases of both these brothers, containing the seeds of both evil courses, in our hearts: but, thanks be to God, under that grace, which is sufficient and willing to seek and save us from both.

CHAP. XVI. 1-8. PARABLE OF THE UNJUST STEWARD. Peculiar to Luke. No parable in the Gospels has been the subject of so much controversy as this: while, at the same time, the general stream of interpretation is well defined, and, in the main, satisfactory. It would be quite beyond the limits of a note to give any thing like a recension of the views respecting it: the principal ones which differ from that which I have adopted, will appear in the course of my remarks. 1.] ἔλεγεν δὲ καί—a continuation, I believe, of the foregoing: - certainly closely connected in subject with it, as is the second parable in this chapter also: see below. τ. μαθ., not to the Twelve only, but to the multitude of the disciples; and more immediately perhaps to the Publicans, whose reception by Him had been the occasion of this discourse. I say this because I believe them to hold a place, though not a principal or an exclusive one, in the application of the parable which ανθρ. τ. ήν πλοίσ.] The history in this parable is, in itself, purely worldly. The master is a vids Tou αίωνος τούτου, as well as his steward:

bear this in mind:—the whole parabolic machinery is from the standing-point of the children of this world. In the interpretation, this rich man is the Almighty Possessor of all things. This is the only tenable view. Meyer, who supposes him to be Mammon (defending it by the consideration that dismissal from his service = being received into everlasting habitations, which it does not, - see below), is involved in inextricable difficulties further on. Olshausen's view, that he = the Devil, the ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, will be found equally untenable. Schleier-macher's, that the Romans are intended, whose stewards the Publicans were, and that the debtors = the Jews, hardly needs refuting; -certainly not more refuting, than any consistent exposition will of itself furnish. οἰκονόμον, a general overlooker-very much what we understand by an agent, or 'a man of business,' or, in the larger sense, a steward. They were generally of old, slaves: but this man is a freeman, from vv. 3, 4. This steward = especially the Publicans, but also all the disciples, i. e. every man in Christ's Church. We are all God's stewards, who commits to our trust His property :- each one's office is of larger or smaller trust and responsibility, according to the measure entrusted to him. I say, especially the Publicans, because the Tweive, and probably others, had relinquished all and followed Christ, and therefore the application of the parable to them would not be so direct: and also because I cannot but put together with this parable, and consider as perhaps prompted by it or the report of it, the profession of Zacchæus, ch. xix. 8. Other interpretations have been-the Pharisees (Vitringa, and more recently Zyro, Theol. Stud. und Krit. for 1831)—but then the parable should have been addressed to them, which it was not,-and this view entirely fails in the application:-Judas Iscariot (Bertholdt), of the vindication of which view I am not in possession, and therefore can only generally say, that it is perfectly preposterous :- Pontius Pilate διεβλήθη - not wrongfully, which the word does not imply necessarily - but maliciously, which it does imply: xxii. 19, 21 only. h = Mark i. 45. see Dan. vi. 24. The reason why it has come so generally to signify 'wrongful accusation,' is, that malicious charges are so frequently slanderous. The steward himself does not deny it. Meyer (see above) in carrying out his view, would interpret this charge as an accusation by the Pharisees against the disciples that they wasted the goods of Mammon by entering the service of Christ:—but then (1) this other service never once appears on the face of the parable; and (2) surely it would hardly be within the bounds of decorum that this διασκορπίζειν should = the entering Christ's service;-this would bring a train of false interpretations with it, and even hold up the abinia of the steward, as such, for imitation.

διασκορπίζων—not that he had wasted (Ε. V.), but was wasting, his goods, &s διασκορπίζων = ὅτι διεσκόρπίζεν. Sοιέβαλλον &s λυμαινόμενον τὴν πολιτείαν, Χειι. Hell. ii. 3. 23. In this charge (spiritually) we may see the real guilt of every man who is entrusted with the goods of our heavenly Father. We are all 'scattering His goods.' If some one is to be found to answer to οἱ διαβάλλοντες, the analogy of δ διάβολος, 'the accuser of the brethren,' is too striking to escape us.

2. τί τοῦτο] It makes very little difference either in admissibility of construction or of sense, whether we render, 'why do I hear this of thee?' i. e. 'what is the ground of this report?— what occasion hast thou given for this being brought to me?' or, 'What is this that I hear of thee?' i. e. 'give some account of it.' There is the same ambiguity in Mark xi. 3, τί ποιεῖτε τοῦτο; I prefer rather the former, because no opportunity of explanation what it is, is given him, but he is commanded to produce his books, to shew how it has arisen. ἀπόδος give up the account of thy stewardship; for (taking for granted the correctness of the report, the steward not denying it) thou wilt not be able to retain thy stewardship any longer,—in ordinary English, thou canst not, &c. δύνη-in the nature of things-thou art precluded from. The interpretation of this announcement to the steward, is the certainty, spoken by God in every one of our consciences, that we must give up and give an account of our stewardship at death. The great truth lies in the background, that that dismissal, death itself, is the consequence of the διασκορπίζειν τὰ ὑπάρχοντα αὐτοῦ, -the wages of sin. steward sets before himself the certainty of poverty and misery. He has not by his waste of his lord's property been laying up any store for himself; -that is not the point of the parable;—he has lived softly and effeminately, and cannot do an honest day's work: -σκάπτειν, for all manual labours; so Aristoph. Av. 1432, σκάπτειν γὰρ οὐκ ἐπίσταμαι. This speech, of digging and begging, must not be sought for in the interpretation; it belongs to the truth of the parable itself as introducing the scheme which follows, but has no ulterior meaning.

We may easily conceive a reason, if we will, in the different circumstances of the debtors. 8. δ κύριος -of course, the lord of the steward. The E. V. ought to have been expressed his lord, and there would have been no ambiguity. τ. οκ. της άδ., not 'the steward for his injustice,' but (see reff.) the unjust steward. He is not praised 'for his injustice:' see below.

ότι φρονίμως έπ., because he had acted shrewdly, cleverly for his own interest. The point brought out is not merely the shrewdness of the steward, but his lord, whose injury was wrought by this very shrewdness, praising it: for, our Saviour adds, the sons of this world, — to which category both belonged—he who conceived and he who praised the shrewd $^{\rm f}$ αίῶνος τούτου $^{\rm g}$ φρονιμώτεροι $^{\rm h}$ ύπὲρ τοὺς $^{\rm fi}$ υίοὺς τοῦ $^{\rm i}$ φω- $^{\rm g}$ ch. xii. 42 refl. compar, τὸς $^{\rm k}$ εἰς τὴν γενεὰν τὴν έαυτῶν εἰσιν. $^{\rm g}$ καὶ ἐγὰ ὑμίν $^{\rm gen}$ cen. xii. 39 τὸς $^{\rm k}$ εἰς τὴν γενεάν την εαυτων εισιν. και την σουν λέγω, $^{\rm l}$ έαυτοῖς $^{\rm l}$ ποιήσατε φίλους ἐκ τοῦ $^{\rm m}$ μαμωνᾶ τῆς $^{\rm l}$ εἰε. iv. $^{\rm leb}$.iv. $^{\rm$ d ἀδικίας, "να όταν η εκλίπη, ο δέξωνται ύμας είς τας xil. 13. αἰωνίους $^{\rm p}$ σκηνάς. 10 ο πιστὸς $^{\rm c}$ ν ελαχίστω καὶ $^{\rm c}$ ν πολλ $^{\rm c}$ ρ $^{\rm s}$ ι John xii. 36. $^{\rm s}$ 1 Thess. v. $^{\rm s}$ 1 = ch. xii. 31. ness-are more shrewd, είς τ. γ. τ. έαυ., for the purposes of their self-interest, -than the sons of light. But this very The fau. indicates that there is a better and a higher γενεά, the family of light (John xii. 36: Rom. xiii. 12: Eph. v. 8: 1 Thess. v. 5), whose interests require a higher and better wisdom and foresight. It is hardly necessary to add that the discovery of the steward's trick by the master is essential to the parable, as exemplifying the φρονίμως and φρονιμώτεροι. Had the master (as Wordsw.) merely seen the result, that the debtors received him into their houses, the praise could hardly have been put in this form. The aor. $\epsilon \pi o l \eta \sigma \epsilon \nu$ too seems to point at the past device, rather than the permanent 9.] We now pass to the application at once-from the mouth of our Lord Himself. All that is dishonest and furtive in the character of the steward belonged entirely to him as a vids τοῦ αίωνος τούτου: but even in this character there was a point to praise and imitate. And the dishonesty itself is not inserted without purpose-viz. to shew us how little the viol \u03c4. ai. \u03c4. scruple to use it, and how natural it is to them. Now, however, we stand on higher ground: καθαροίς πάντα καθαρά:-in bringing up the example into the purer air which the sons of light breathe, its grosser parts drop off, and the finer only remain.

καὶ ἐγὼ ὑμῖν λ. seems to recognize a necessary difference in the two situations: - although you are sons of the light and the day, and can do no such furtive acts, yet I say to YOU' This view will explain how we may make φίλους έκ τοῦ μαμ. τῆς ἀδ. just as we can make an example for ourselves out of the οἰκονόμος της άδικ.—that which is of itself της άδικίας-which belongs to, is part of a system of, abirla,-which is the very ρίζα πάντων των κακών, the result, and the aptest concretion, of that system of meum and tuum (see ch. xv. 12) which is itself the result of sin having entered into the world. And we are to use this Mammon of unrighteousness to make ourselves, -not palaces, nor barns, nor estates, nor treasures, - but friends; i. e. to bestow it on the poor and needy-(see ch. xii. 33, which is the most striking parallel to our text-compare όταν ἐκλίπη, with θησαυρου ανέκλειπτον there) that when it shall fail,-they, i.e. the φίλοι-(compare the joy in heaven ch. xv. 7, 10, and Baxter's remark cited there by Stier-'Is there joy in heaven at thy conversion, and will there be none at thy glorification?') may receive you into the (or their) everlasting tabernacles. See also ch. xiv. 13, 14. God repays in their name. They receive us there with joy, if they are gone before us: they receive us there by making us partakers of their prayers, which 'move the Hand that moves the world,' even during this life. Deeds then of charity and mercy are to be our spiritual shrewdness, by which we may turn to our account the ἄδικον μαμωνᾶ,—providing ourselves with friends out of it;—and the debtors are here perhaps to be taken in their literal, not parabolic sense-we are to lighten their burdens by timely relief -the only way in which a son of light can change the hundred into fifty, or fourscore: see Isa. lviii. 6-8.

The connexion here is,-that we must, while put in trust with the ἄδικος μαμωνας, be serving not it, but God. The saying here applies (as Olshausen remarks) admirably to the Pharisees and Publicans: the former were, to outward appearance, the servants of God, but inwardly served Mammon; -the latter, by profession in the service of Mammon, were, by coming to Jesus, shewing that they inwardly served God.

14-31.] By occasion of the covet-OUS PHARISEES DERIDING HIM, OUR LORD SPEAKS THE PARABLE OF THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS. The Pharisees were not slow in perceiving that the scope of ταῦτα πάντα was to place this world's goods, and all that the covetous seek after, at a very low price. It will be observed that the sayings which follow, are in reference to matters mentioned during the discourses, or arising out of the character of the Pharisees as commented on in them. δικαιούντες last note, end. ένώπ. τ. άνθρ., a contrast to ήμαρτον ενώπιον σου, ch. xv. 18: and βδέλυν. ἐνώπιον τ. θεοῦ to χαρὰ ἐνώπιον τ. ἀγγ. τοῦ θεοῦ, ch. xv. 10. 16.] See Matt. xi. 12 and note. goods. But, since John, a kingdom has been preached, into which every one, publicans and sinners too (mas | mavtes, ch. xv. 1) are pressing in. The true relation however of that kingdom to the law is not as ye suppose, to destroy the law (Matt. v. 17), but to fulfil.' Then, as an example, our Lord reiterates the decision which He had before given on a point much controverted among the Jewsthe law of adultery. But this He does, not without occasion given, and close connexion with the circumstances, and with what had before been said. As early as Tertullian, cont. Marc. iv. 34, vol. ii. p. 443, it was remarked, that an allusion was meant here to the adultery of Herod Antipas with his brother Philip's wife, which the Pharisees had tacitly sanctioned, thus allowing an open breach of that law which Christ came to fulfil. To this mention of Herod's crime the μέχρι 'Ιωάννου gave relevance. Still the idea must not be too lightly assumed. Bleek's remark is worth notice, that, had such an allusion been intended, the last words of the verse would have been otherwise expressed. Antipas had not married a divorced woman, but abduced a married woman from her husband. See on Matt. 19-31.] Our Lord, in this closing parable, grasps the whole covetous and self-seeking character of the Pharisees, shews them a case in which it is carried to the utmost, by one who 'made no friends' with the unrighteous Mammon; -- places in contrast with it a case of extreme destitution and poverty,-the very thing which the φιλάργυρος most abhorred; - and then passes over into the region beyond the grave, shewing them the contrast there also—and ending with a mysterious prophetic hint at the final rejection of the Kingdom of God and Himself by those for whom the law and prophets were insufficient to bring them to repentance. And while it does not appear that the $\phi\iota\lambda\alpha\rho\gamma\nu\rho\iota\alpha$ of the Pharisees shewed itself in this particular way, our Lord here grasps the depravity by its root, which is, a godless and loveless self-seeking—saying in the heart, 'There is no God'—and acting accordingly.

The explanation of particular points see below. 19.] $\delta\epsilon$ connects this directly with what goes before; being an answer, not immediately to any thing said by the Pharisees, but to their scoffs at Him ;q. d. 'hear now a parable.' πλ.] Tertullian thought (l. c.) that Herod was meant, and by Lazarus John; and this view has been taken by Paulus and Schleiermacher also: but surely with no probability. Our Lord might hint with stern rebuke at the present notorious crime of Herod, but can hardly be thought to have spoken thus of him. That the circumstances will in some measure apply to these two, is owing, as above in ch. xv., to the parable taking the general case, of which theirs was a particular instance. Zeller (refuted by Bleek in loc.) thinks that the rich man sets forth the Jews and the poor man the Gentiles. In my view, the very name of the poor man (see below) is a sufficient answer to this.

Observe, that this rich man is not accused of any flagrant crimes:—he lives, as the world would say, as became his means and station; he does not oppress

Others render it enjoyed himself sumptuously? 20.] The significant name Lazarus (= Eleuzarus = , , Deus auxilium) should have prevented the expositors from imagining this to be a true Perhaps by this name our Lord may have intended to fill in the character of the poor man, which indeed must otherwise be understood to be that of one who feared God. ¿BÉB., was, or had been, cast down, i. e. was placed there on purpose to get what he could of πυλώνα, see on ref. Matt.: it was the portal, which led out of the προαύλιον into the αὐλή. would seem that he did obtain this wish, and that, as in ch. xv. 16, the emil. must mean, he looked for it, willingly took it.

The ἀλλὰ καί seems also to imply, that he got the crumbs: this verse, relating the two points of contrast to the rich man: his only food, the crumbs, with which he longed to fill his belly, but could not:—his only clothing, nakedness and sores, and instead of the boon companions of the rich man, none to pity him but the dogs, who ἐπέλειχον—certainly in pity, not 'dolorem exasperantes' (Bengel)—his sores, as they do their own. Such was the state of the two in this world.

22.] The burial of Lazarus is not mentioned, διά τὸ ἀτημέλητον τῆς τῶν πτωχῶν ταφηs, Euthym. This is the only admissible reason. Meyer rejects it as arbitrary, and not consistent with the received notions about Hades, in which not the soul only, but the whole man was after death-believing it to be meant that the angels carried Lazarus bodily into Paradise. But then his interpretation halts, when he comes to the burial of the rich man, whom he makes go down out of his grave into hell. The fact is, that in both cases the material corpse remains on this earth, buried or unburied; while that personality, to which universal consent rightly attributes sensibility to bliss and woe, and the feelings and parts of the body, the man's real self, is translated into the other world. (If, when parts of the body are removed, we still believe that we possess those limbs, and feel pain in them, why may not the disembodied spirit still subjectively exist in, and feel the sensations of, that corporeal system from which it is temporarily separated?) αὖτ.] In the whole of this description, the following canon of interpretation may be safely laid down :- Though it is unnatural to suppose that our Lord would in such a parable formally reveal any new truth respecting the state of the dead,yet, in conforming himself to the ordinary language current on these subjects, it is impossible to suppose that He, whose essence is Truth, could have assumed as existing any thing which does not exist. It would destroy the truth of our Lord's sayings, if we could conceive Him to have used popular language which did not point at truth. And accordingly, where such language was current, we find Him not adopting, but protesting against it: see Matt. xv. 5. The bearing of the spirits of the just into bliss by the holy angels is only analogous to their other employments: see Matt. xiii. 41: Heb. i. τ. κόλπ. 'Αβραάμ] The above remark does not apply here for this, as a form of speech among the Jews, was not even by themselves understood in its strict literal sense; and though the purposes of the parable require this, ver. 23, no one would think of pressing it into a truth, but all would see in it the graphic filling up of a state which in itself is strictly actual. The expression signified the happy side of Hades, where all the Fathers were conceived as resting in bliss. In Joseph. de Macc. § 13 we have ούτω γὰρ θανόντας ήμᾶς ᾿Αβραὰμ κ. Ἰσ. κ. Ἰακ. ὑποδέξονται εἰς τοὺς κόλπους αὐτῶν. Νο preeminence is signified, as in John xiff. 23; -all the blessed are spoken of as in Abraham's bosom. See also John i. 18.

The death of the rich man last

The death of the rich man last should be remarked; Lazarus was taken soon from his sufferings; Dives was left longer, that he might have space to repent.

κ. ἐτάφη] There can be no doubt that the funeral is mentioned as being congruous to his station in life,—and, as Trench observes, 'in a sublime irony,'—implying that he had all things properly cared for; the purple and fine linen which he wore in life, not spared at his obsequies. See Meyer's interpretation above. 23. iv 7. 48n] Hades, int, is the abode of all disembodied spirits till the resurrection; not, the place of torment,—much less hell, as understood commonly, in the E. V. Lazarus was also in Hades, but separate from Dives; one on the blissful, the other on the baleful side. It is the gates of Hades, the imprisonment of death, which shall not prevail against the Church (Matt. xvi. 18);—the Lord holds the key of Hades, (Rev. i. 18);—Himself went into the same Hades, of which Paradise is a part.

èv βασάνοις—not eternal condemnation;—for the judgment has not yet taken place; men can only be judged in the body; for the deeds done in the body:—but, the certainty and anticipation of it. ἐπάρας, not necessarily to a higher place, though that may be meant:—see reff. 24.] 'Superbus temporis, mendicus inferni?' φλογί, not subjective only, though perhaps mainly. The omission of the article before βασάνοις points no doubt to subjective torments;—but where lies the limit between inner and outer to the disembodied? Hardened sinners have died crying 'Fire!'—Did the fire leave them, when they left their bodies?

25.] The answer is solemn, calm, and fatherly;—there is no mocking, as is found in the Koran under the same circumstances; no grief, as is sometimes represented affecting the blessed spirits for the lot of the lost. μνήσθητι . . .] Analogy aleitet.) gives us every reason to suppose, that in the disembodied state the whole life on earth will lie before the soul in all its thoughts, words, and deeds, like a map of the past journey before a traveller.

ἀπέλαβες - not sufficiently expressed by 'receivedst,' E. V.:—it is analogous to ἀπέχουσιν, Matt. vi. 2, 5, 16,-and expresses the receipt in full, the exhaustion of all claim on. Those that were good things to thee, Tà ay. Gov, came to an end in thy lifetime: there are no more of them. What a weighty, precious word is this σου: were it not for it, De Wette and the like, who maintain that the only meaning of the parable is, ' Woe to the rich, but blessed are the poor'would have found in this verse at least a specious defence for their view:-though even then tà ày, would have implied the same, in fair interpretation. -not autou-for to him they were not so.

χάσμα μέγα] In the interpretation,-the irresistible decree-then truly so, but no such on earth-by which the Almighty Hand hath separated us and you, in order that, not merely so that, none may pass it. In the graphic description, a yawning chasm impassable. ρικται, is fixed for ever. This expression precludes all idea that the following verse indicates the beginning of a better mind in the rich man. 27.] This is the be-lieving and trembling of James ii. 19. His eyes are now opened to the truth; and no wonder that his natural sympathies are awakened for his brethren. That a lost spirit should feel and express such sympathy, is not to be wondered at; the misery of such will be very much heightened by the awakened and active state of those higher faculties and feelings which selfishness and the body kept down here.

timony from our Lord Himself of the sufficiency then of the O.T. Scriptures for the salvation of the Jews. It is not so now.

30, 31.] οὐχί—not, 'they will not hear them :' he could not tell that, and besides, it would have taken away much of the ground of the answer of Abraham :the word deprecates leaving their salvation in such uncertainty, as the chance of their hearing Moses and the Prophets seems to him to imply .- 'Leave it not so, when it might be at once and for ever done by sending them one from the dead.' ham's answer, besides opening to us a depth in the human heart, has a plain application to the Pharisees, to whom the parable was spoken. They would not hear Moses and the Prophets:—Christ rose from the dead, but He did not go to them ;this verse is not so worded, 'they would have rejected Him, had He done so:' the fact merely is here supposed, and that in the very phrase which so often belongs to His own resurrection. They were not persuaded-did not believe, though One rose from the dead. To deny altogether this allusion, is to rest contented with merely the surface of the parable.

Observe, Abraham does not say, 'they will not repent'-but, 'they will not believe, be persuaded:' which is another and a deeper

Luther does not seem to conthing. clude rightly, that this disproves the possibility of appearances of the dead. It only says, that such appearances will not bring about faith in the human soul: but that they may not serve other ends in God's dealings with men, it does not assert. There is no gulf between the earth and Hades: and the very form of Abraham's answer, setting forth no impossibility in this second case, as in the former, would seem to imply its possi-bility, if requisite. We can hardly pass over the identity of the name LAZARUS with that of him who actually was recalled from the dead, but whose return, far from persuading the Pharisees, was the immediate exciting cause of their crowning act of unbelief.

V., is not exact: give us more faith, is more literal and simpler. Wordsw.'s rendering, "Give faith in addition to our other privileges, powers, and virtues," is not so probable, seeing 1) that faith is not the crowning item in such a list, but the first and most elementary: and 2) that, had this been intended, it would most probably have been expressed πρόςθ. ήμιν καί This is the only example in the Gospels in which the Apostles are marked out as requesting or saying any thing to the Lord. work mere feats of supernatural power, but preached by His miracles as well as by His discourses. 17.] Were not the ten cleansed? but (of those ten) the nine, where (are they)? 18. ὁ ἀλλογ. οὖτ.] The Samaritans were Gentiles; -not a mixed race, as is sometimes erroneously supposed. They had a mixed religion, but were themselves originally from other countries: see 2 Kings xvii. 24-41. There may have been a reason for the nine Jews not returning,-that they held the ceremonial duty imposed on them to be paramount, which the Samaritan might not rate so highly. That he was going to Mount Gerizim does not appear: from his being found with Jews, he probably would act as a Jew.

19. σέσωκέν σε-in a higher sense than the mere cleansing of his leprosy-theirs was merely the beholding of the brazen serpent with the outward eyes,-but his, with the eye of inward faith; and this faith saved him; -not only healed his body, but his soul.

20-37.] PROPHETIC ANSWER TO THE PHARISEES. In this discourse we have several sayings which our Lord afterwards repeated in His last prophetic discourse to the four apostles on Mount Olivet; but much also which is peculiar to Luke, and most precious (eine töftliche Perle, De Wette). 20.] The question certainly is asked by the Pharisees, as all their questions were asked, with no good end in view: to entangle our Lord, or draw from Him some direct announcement which might be matter of accusation.

παρατηρ.] with (accompanied with) anticipation, or observation. The cognate verb is used ch. xiv. 1 of the Pharisees 'watching' Jesus. 21. o'dè èp. . . .] Its coming shall be so gradual and unobserved, that none during its waxing onward shall be able to point here or there for a ίδου γάρ] for proof of its coming. behold the kingdom of God is (already) among you. The misunderstanding which rendered these words 'within you,' meaning this in a spiritual sense, 'in your hearts,' should have been prevented by reflecting that they are addressed to the Pharisees, in whose hearts it certainly was not. Nor could the expression in this connexion well bear this spiritual meaning potentially-i. e. is in its nature, within your hearts. The words are too express and emphatic for this. We have the very expression, Xen. Anab. i. 10. 3,—ἀλλὰ καλ ταύτην έσωσαν (οί "Ελληνες) καὶ ἄλλα δπόσα ἐντὸς αὐτῶν καὶ χρήματα καὶ ἄνθρωποι ἐγένοντο πάντα ἔσωσαν:—see also John i. 26; xii. 35, both of which are analogous expressions. See the two renderings compared in Bleek's note.

The kingdom of God was begun among them, and continues thus making its way in the world, without observation of men; so that whenever men can say 'lo here or lo there,'—whenever great 'revivals' or 'triumphs of the faith' can be pointed to, they stand self-condemned as not belonging to that kingdom. Thus we see that every such marked event in the history of the Church is by God's own hand as it were blotted and marred, so as not to deceive us into thinking that the kingdom has come. So it was at the Pentecostal era:—so at that of Constantine;—so at the Reformation. The meaning 'among you,' includes of course the deeper and personal one 'within each of you,' but the two are not convertible.

22.] This saying is taken up from εντδς ύμῶν ἐστίν. 'He is among you, who is the Bridegroom,—the Son of Man;'—during whose presence ye cannot mourn, but when He shall be taken from you, you shall wish in vain for one of these days of His presence. Stier (iii. 362) thinks this addressed to the Pharisees also, and to apply to their recognizing too late in their future misery the Messiahship of Jesus:—but this does not appear from the text. Meyer tries to prove this interpretation altogether wrong, from the εντ ήμεραις τ. υί. τ. ἀνθ., ver. 26. But the words have the general meaning of the days of the Son of Man's presence, and this extends on to His future presence, or $\pi \alpha \rho o \sigma i \alpha$, as well. Of course, if they hereafter desired to see one of the days of His presence, it would be a second or future presence.

37.] ποῦ, not 'how?' (Kuinoel) but literal—where shall this happen? The disciples know not the universality of this which our Lord is announcing to them, and which His dark and awful saying proclaims, see note on it, Matt. xxiv. 28.

Observe, there is not a word, except so far as the greater coming includes the lesser, in all this, of the destruction of Jerusalem. The future παρουσία of the Lord is the only subject: and thus it is an entirely distinct discourse from that in Matt. xxiv., or our ch. xxi.

Chap. XVIII. 1—8.] The unjust Judge. This parable, though not perhaps spoken in immediate unbroken sequence after the last discourse, evidently arose out of it:—perhaps was the fruit of a conversation with the disciples about the day of His coming and the mind with which they must expect it. For observe that in its direct application it is ecclesisatical; and not individual, but by a legitimate accommodation. The widow is the Church; the judge, her God and Father in heaven. The argument, as in the parable of the steward $\tau \eta s$ ddik(as, so in this of the $\kappa \rho \iota \tau \eta s$ $\tau \eta s$ ddik(as, is à fortiori: 'If such be the power of earnest entreaty, that it can win right even from a man sunk in selfishness and fearing neither God nor men, how much more will the right be done by the just and holy God in answer to the continued prayers of his elect:' even though, when this very right is asserted in the world by the coming of the Son of Man, He may hardly find among his people the power to believe it—though few of them will have shewn this unweariedness of entreaty which the poor widow shewed?

He, like the steward above, was της άδικίας, belonging to, being of, the iniquity which prevails in the world. 5.] εἰς τέλος belongs to ἐρχο-μένη, as in Ε. ὑπωπιάζη, from ὑπώπιον, the part of the cheek immediately beneath the eyes, signifies literally to smite in the face; -and proverbially (see reff.), to mortify or incessantly annoy. It answers exactly to the Latin obtundo, which Terence has in this sense, 'Ne me obtundas had de re sæpius,' Adelph. i. 2. 33; and al. fr.— Livy, 'Neque ego obtundam, sæpius eadem nequicquam agendo,' ii. 15. The Greek word does not appear to be any where used in this sense;—so that the use of it here may be a Latinism, as Grotius thought. Meyer interprets it literally— 'lest at last she should become desperate and come and strike me in the face.' It has been observed that the Apostles acted from this very motive when they besought the Lord to send away the Syrophænician woman,- 'for she cried after them.' widow in this case (the forsaken Church, contending with her adversary the devil, 1 Pet. v. 8) has this additional claim, in which the right of her cause consists,that she is the Elect of God,-His Beloved. ἡμέρας κ. νυκτός] This answers to the πάντοτε in ver. 1, but is an amplification of it. κ. μακροθυμεῖ and He delays his vengeance in their case :- and He, in their case, is long-suffering. 'Est in hac voce dilationis significatio, quæ ut debitori prodest, ita gravis est ei qui vim patitur.' Grotius. The rec. reading, μακροθυμών, conveys the same meaning, καί being understood as καίπερ. This is perhaps what the E. V. means by 'though He bear long with them,' which is ambiguous as it stands. The μακροθ. has no doubt a general reference also to God's dealing with man: see 2 Pet. iii. 9, 15.

8.] έν τάχει will not bear the meaning 'swiftly,' i. e. 'suddenly, when it comes, but (see reff.) is shortly-soon, speedily, as E. V. And this is no inconsistency with μακροθυμεί: see 2 Pet. iii. 8, 9.

πλην] See the beginning of this note. This can hardly be, as Meyer interprets it, that the painful thought suddenly occurs to the Lord, how many there will be even at His coming who will not have received Him as the Messiah: for ή πίστις, though 'faith' generally, is yet here faith in reference to the object of the parable—faith which has endured in prayer without fainting. Or the meaning may be general and objective; as in reff.

9-14.] THE PHAR SEE AND THE PUBLICAN. This parable is spoken not to the Pharisees, for our Lord would not in their presence have chose 1 a Pharisee as an example: nor concerning the Pharisees. for then it would have been no parablebut to the people, and with reference to some among them (then and always) Tous πεπ. ὅτι εἰσὶν δίκ., who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and de-spised other men. The parable de-scribes an every day occurrence: the parabolic character is given by the concurrence and grouping of the two, and by the fact that each of these represents psychologically a class of persons.

9.] πρός, to, not concerning: it was concerning them, it is true:-but this word expresses that it was spoken to them. The usage of $\pi \rho \delta s$ in ver. 1 is no example for the sense concerning, for it is not there so used of persons, but with a neuter article and infinitive: εἶπεν πρὸς αὐτοὺς παρ. is too general a phrase, to allow of any other interpretation than the ordinary one, where the context will bear πεποιθ. ἐφ' ἐαυτ., not, 'were persuaded of themselves,' as Greswell renders; but as E. V., trusted in themselves: see reff. 10, 11.] πρὸς ἐαυτόν belongs to προςηύχ. (cf. Mark xiv. 4), not to σταθείς: that would be καθ' έαυτόν, see James ii. 17. He stood (in the ordinary place), and prayed thus with himself, as E. V., - apud animum suum: such a prayer he would not dare to put up aloud (Meyer). The Church has admirably fitted to this parable the declaration of thankfulness in 1 Cor. xv. 9, 10 (the two being the Epistle and Gospel for the Eleventh Sunday after Trinity), also made by a Pharisee, and also on the ground 'that he was not as other men :'but how different in its whole spirit and There, in the deepest humility, he ascribes it to the grace of God that he laboured more abundantly than they all ;yet, not I, but the grace of God that was 12. νηστ. δὶς τ. σ. This with me. was a voluntary fast, on the Mondays and Thursdays; the only prescribed fast in the year being the great day of atonement, see Levit. xvi. 29: Num. xxix. 7. So that he is boasting of his works of supererogation. ἀποδ. πάντα Here again, the law perhaps (but cf. Abraham's practice, Gen. xiv. 20; and Jacob's, Gen. xxviii. 22) only required tithe of the fruit of the field, and the produce of the cattle: see on Matt. xxiii. 23. κτώμαι] Not I possess, which would be κέκτημαι-but I acquire; - of all my increase: see Deut. xiv. 22. His speech shows admirably what his πεποίθησις έφ' έαυτῷ was. μακρόθεν-far from the Pharisee; -a contrast in spirit to the other's thanks that he was not as other men, is furnished by the poor Publican in his humility acknowledging this by an act. όφθ.] Another contrast, -for we must here suppose that the Pharisee prayed with all significance of gesture, with eyes and hands uplifted (see Matt. vi. 5). There is a slight but true difference also in σταθείς of the Pharisee-'being put in position' (answering to 'being seated' of the other usual posture), and έστώς of the publican, - 'standing;'-coming in merely and remaining, in no studied place or posture. So Tacitus, Hist. iv. 72, 'stabant conscientia flagitii mæstæ fixis in terram oculis :'- see also Ezra ix. 6. [είς] τ. στ.] See ch. xxiii. 48, 'prædolore animi : ubi dolor, ibi manus.' Bengel. There may be a stress on To bef. apapt., 'me the sinner.' Gresw. But see reff., where, as probably here, the art. is generic. It seems to me that any emphatic comparison here would somewhat detract from the solemnity and simplicity of the prayer (agst. Stier, iii. 384, edn. 2). The To rather implies, not comparison with others, but intense self-abasement: "sinner that I am." Nor are we to find any doctrinal meanings in λάσθ.: WE know of one only way, in which the prayer could be accomplished: but the words here have no reference to that, nor could they have.

One returned home in the sight of God with his prayer answered, and that prayer had grasped the true object of prayer,—the forgiveness of sins (so that $\delta\epsilon\delta$) is in the usual sense of the Epistles of Paul, justified before God-see reff.), the other prayed not for it, and obtained it not. Therefore he who would seek justification before God must seek it by humility and not by self-righteousness. ο ὑψῶν ἐαυτ. has been illustrated in the demeanour of the Pharisee ;- ταπεινωθ. in his failure to obtain justification from God: - ταπεινών έαυτόν in that of the Publican; - ὑψωθήσ. in his obtaining the answer to his prayer, which was this justification. Thus the particular instance is bound up with the general truth.

TO CHRIST. Here the narrative of Luke again falls in with those of Matthew and Mark, after a divergence of nearly nine chapters: see note on ch. ix. 51. Matt. xix. 13-15. Mark x. 13-16. The narrative part of our text is distinct from the two; the words of our Lord are verbatim as Mark: see notes on Matt. The place and time indicated here are the same as before, from ch. xvii. 11.

The supposition that they were two miracles is perfectly monstrous; and would at once destroy the credit of Matthew as a truthful narrator. If further proof of their identity were wanting to any one, we might find it in the fact that the following expressions are common to Mark and Luke. In Matt. of course they are in the plural, as he has two blind πει. $-\dot{\epsilon}$ κάθητο παρὰ τ. όδὸν ἐπαιτῶν (προσείτης ἐκαθ. π. τ. όδο.) – Ιησοῦς ὁ Ναζωραῖος (-αρηνός) $-\dot{\epsilon}$ πετίμων αὐτῷ ἴνα σιγήση (σιωπ.) $-\dot{\alpha}$ υτὸς (δ) δὲ πολλῷ μᾶλλον ἔκραζεν νίὲ Δ. ἐλέησόν με $-\tau$ ί σοι θέλεις ποιήσω (θ. π. σ.) -κύριε (βαβ. βουνί Mark as usual) Ίνα αναβλέψω-ή πίστις σου σέσωκέν σε. 36. τί είη] Luke generally inserts av-see ch. ix. 46: Acts v. 24; x. 17 al. and var. readings.

The probability is, that our Lord's supernatural knowledge of man (see John i. 48-50) is intended to be understood as the means of his knowing Zacchæus: but the narrative does not absolutely exclude the supposition of a personal knowledge of Zacchaus on the part of some around Him. But of what possible import can such a question be, when the narrative plainly shews us that Jesus saw into his heart? Cannot He who knows the thoughts, call by the name also? μείναι, probably over the $\delta \epsilon \hat{i}$, it is night. See John i. 40. my purpose, or even more, I must;

παρὰ άμ. ἀνδρί belongs to καταλῦσαι. His profession in life, and perhaps an unprincipled exercise of his power in it, had carned him this name with his fellow-countrymen. Cf. his confession in the next verse.

8. This need not have taken place in the morning; much more probably it was immediately on our Lord's entrance into the house, while the multitude were yet murmuring in the court, and in their presence. Our Lord's answer, σήμερον . . . τῷ οἴκῳ τούτῳ, looks as if He were just entering the house, not just leaving it; and the σήμ. must be the same with that in ver. 5. σταθείς has something formal and predetermined about it: he stood forward, with some effort and resolve: see on ch. xviii. 11 ff. τὰ ἡμ. . . . πτωχ. δίδ.] See note on ch. xvi. 9. 11-27.] PARABLE OF THE MINÆ. Peculiar to Luke. By the introductory words, the parable must have been spoken in the house of Zacchæus, i. e. perhaps in the open room looking into the court, where probably many of the multitude were assembled. A parable very similar in some points to this was spoken by our Lord in His last great prophetic discourse, Matt. xxv. 14-30. Many modern Commentators (Calv., Olsh., Meyer (on Matt.), but not Schleierm. or De Wette) maintain that the two parables represent one and the same: if so, we must at once give up, not only the pretensions to historical accuracy on the part of our Gospels, (see ver. 11,) but all idea that they furnish us with the words of our Lord any where: for the whole structure and incidents of the two are essentially different. If oral tradition thus varied before the Gospels were written, in the report of our Lord's spoken words, how can we know that He spoke any thing which they relate? If the Evangelists themselves altered, arranged, and accommodated those discourses, not only is the above the case, but their honesty is likewise impugned (see Prolegomena to Gospels). Besides, we shall here find the parable, in its very root and point of comparison, individual and distinct. Compare throughout the notes on Matt.

The groundwork of this part of the parable seems to have been derived from the history of Archelaus, son of Herod the Great. The kings of the Herodian family made journeys to Rome, to receive their βασιλείαν. On Archelaus's doing so, the Jews sent after him a protest, which however was not listened to by Augustus. Jos. Antt. xvii. 11. 1 ff. The situation was appropriate; for at Jericho was the royal palace which Archelaus had built with great magnificence. Jos. Antt. xvii. 13. 1. 13. δέκα] See on Matt. xxv. 1. found worthy to obtain that state of life and the resurrection from the dead, are no longer under the ordinance of marriage: for neither can they any more die; i. e. they will have no need of a succession and renewal, which is the main purpose of marriage. 36.] The lσάγγ. γάρ εἰσιν is alleged, not as shewing them to be ἀπαθεῖς κ. ἀφιλήδονοι (Euthym.), but as setting forth their immortality. viol θ. is here used, not in its ethical sense, as applied to believers in this world,-but its metaphysical sense, as denoting the essential state of the blessed after the resurrection:- 'they are, by their resurrection, essentially partakers of the divine nature, and so cannot die.' When Meyer says that the Lord only speaks of the risen, and has not here in His view the 'quick' at the time of His coming, it must be remembered that the 'change' which shall pass on them (1 Cor. xv. 51-54) shall put them into precisely the same ἀφθαρσία as the risen (compare ibid. ver. 42). 37. kai M., that very Moses, whom you allege as shewing by inference the contrary. 38.] On πάντ. у. адт. 5. see on Matt. vv. 31-33: but we have in this argument even a further generalization than in Matt. and Mark.

There, it is a covenant relation on which the matter rests: here, a life of all, living and dead, in the sight of God,-so that none are annihilated,-but in the regard of Him who inhabiteth Eternity, the being of all is a living one, in all its changes. 39, 40.] Peculiar to Luke;—implied however in Matt. ver. 34, and Mark ver. 28.

41—44.7 QUESTION RESPECTING CHRIST AND DAVID. Matt. xxii. 41-46: Mark xii. 35-37, where see notes. Luke omits the question of the lawyer, which occurred immediately on the gathering together of the Pharisees after the last incident. This question of our Lord seems to have followed close on that, which (and not that in vv. 27 ff. here) was their last to Him, Mark xii. 34. 41.] πρὸς αὐτούς, i. e. the Scribes. The same thing is signified by πως λέγουσιν οί γρ. in Mark. In Matt. the question is addressed to the Pharisees. I mention these things as marks of the independence of the accounts. The underlying fact is, the Lord addressed the Pharisees and Scribes on a view which they (the Scribes, the Pharisees agreeing) entertained about the Messiah. Hence the three accounts diverge.

yas. 5-36. PROPRECY OF HIS COMING. AND OF THE TIMES OF THE END. Matt. xxiv. 1-51 (xxv. 1-46). Mark xiii. 1-37. See notes on both, but especially on Matt. Meyer says truly in loc. that there is no trace in Luke of the discourse being delivered on the Mount of Olives—but he adds, that it belongs to the discourses in the temple, which begin ch. xx. 1, and that therefore Luke alone mentions $\partial u \partial \eta \mu \alpha \tau \alpha$. He seems to have overlooked the break at ver. 7, corresponding to the change of scene. All three speak of the opening incident as happening while He was departing from the temple; and Matt. and Mark, of the enquiry being made afterwards, on the Mount of Olives,—i. e. in the evening, when He had retired thither (ver. 37).

5.] Meyer has made the same mistake here, and spoken of the $\tau w \acute{\epsilon}s$ as those to whom the discourse was delivered. The ἀναθήματα were many and precious. Tacitus, Hist. v. 8, calls it immensæ opulentiæ templum: and Jos., B. J. v. 5. 4, gives an account of the gilding, and golden vines (presented by Herod the Great) with bunches of grapes as large as a man, &c. in the temple: see also Autt. xv. 11. 3. 6.] ταῦτα ἃ θ.,—absolute: see reff. 7.] That Luke's account alone gives us no trace of a different scene or a different auditory, is a proof of its independence of the others; for how could any rational writer have omitted

37, 38. Peculiar to Luke. These verses close the scene of our Lord's discourses in Jerusalem which began ch. xx. 1. It does not appear, as Meyer will have it, that Luke believed our Lord to have taught Lake believed our Lord to have taught after this in the temple. Nothing is said to imply it—a general closing formula like this applies to what has been related.

38.] ωρθρ. is literal,—not figurative, 'came eagerly,' as De Wette, &c. think, from several places in the LXX. There is no occasion for a figure Luke relates nothing of any visits to Bethany. He has the name, incidentally only, in ch. xix. 29 and ch. xxiv. 50, where see note. On the whole question regarding the history of the woman taken in adultery (see digest), compare notes, John viii. 1 ff.

CHAP. XXII. 1, 2.7 CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES TO KILL JESUS. Matt. xxvi. 1—5. Mark xiv. 1, 2. The account of Matt. is the fullest: see notes there. The words here give us a mere compendium of what took place. 3-6.] COMPACT OF JUDAS WITH THEM TO BETRAY HIM. Matt. xxvi. 14-16. Mark xiv. 10, 11. Our account is strikingly peculiar and independent of the others. The expression els $\hat{\eta}\lambda\theta$. Sè σατ. is found in John xiii. 27,-and certainly in its proper place. Satan had not yet entered into Judas,—only (John xiii. 2) put it into his heart to betray our Lord. 4.] καὶ στρατηγοῖς is peculiar to Luke: the others have merely the chief priests. On orpar., see Acts iv. 1. The Levitical guard of the temple would be consulted, because it had been of late especially in the temple that our Lord coming from the country might eat the Passover. The question therefore would be well understood; - and the room being ἐστρωμένον, and as Mark adds, ἕτοιμον, would be no matter of surprise.

14.] The ωρα was evening, see above on

ver. 10, and Matt. xxvi. 20.

15-18.] Peculiar to Luke. The desire of our Lord to eat this His last Passover may be explained from ch. xii. 50: not merely from his depth of love for His disciples, though this formed an element in it, -see John xiii. 1 sq. The yap in ver. 16 gives us the leading reason. 15. παθείν] This is the only instance in the Gospels, of the absolute use of máoxw, as in the Creed, 'He suffered.' We have several times πολλὰ παθεῖν, ch. ix. 22; xvii. 25: Matt. xvi. 21 al. ταῦτα παθεῖν, ch. xxiv. 26, and ούτως παθείν, ditto ver. 46.

16. The full meaning of this declaration is to be sought in the words τοῦτο τὸ πάσχα. It was that particular Passover, not merely the Passover generally-though of course that also,-that was to receive its fulfilment in the kingdom of God. And to this fulfilment our Lord alludes again in ver. 30, ίνα έσθητε καὶ πίνητε ἐπὶ τῆς τραπέζης μου ἐν τῆ βασιλεία μου. It is to this marriage supper of the Lamb, that the parable Matt. xxii. 1-14 in its ultimate application refers: nor can we help thinking on the faithless Apostle at this very supper, in ib. vv. 11—13: see notes there.

17.] Some (e. g. De Wette) suppose that it is here implied that our Lord did not drink of the cup Himself. But surely this cannot be so. The two members of the speech are strictly parallel: and if He desired to eat the Passover with them, He would also drink of the cup, which formed a usual part of the ceremonial. This seems to me to be implied in δεξάμενος: λαβών is the word used by all afterwards, when He did not partake of the bread and wine. This most important addition in our narrative, amounts I believe to a solemn declaration of the fulfilment of the Passover rite, in both its usual divi sions,-the eating the flesh of the lamb, and drinking the cup of thanksgiving. Henceforward, He who fulfilled the Law for man will no more eat and drink of it. I remark this, in order further to observe that this division of the cup is not only not identical with, but has no reference to, the subsequent one in ver. 20. That was the institution of a new rite; -this the abrogation of an old one, now fulfilled, or about to be so, in the person of the true Lamb of God. This is generally supposed to have been the first cup in the Passover-meal, with which the whole was introduced. On the possible connexion of this speech of our Lord with the celebration of the Passover at this particular time, see note on Matt. xxvi. 17.

After these verses, in order of time, follows the washing of the disciples' feet in John xiii. 1—20, referred to in our ver. 27.

See notes on Matthew. 20. τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ἐχυννόμενον] These words cannot be said of ποτήριον, 'nam poculum plenum non effunditur, sed bibitur' (Bengel), but are said πρὸς τὸ σημαινόμενον, which is the wine poured out from the grapes (τὸ γέννημα τῆς ἀμπέλου) and represents the Blood poured out from the Lord's Body. Here follows, in Matt. ver. 29, Mark ver. 25, a second declaration, respecting not drinking any more of this fruit of the vine.

21-23.] ANNOUNCEMENT OF A BE-

TRAYER. See notes on Matt. xxvi. 20—25. I would not venture absolutely to maintain that this announcement is identical with that one; but I own the arguments of Stier and others to prove them distinct, fail to convince me. The expression πλην ίδού bears marks of verbal accuracy, and inclines us to believe that this announcement was made after the institution of the cup, as here related. 'Notwithstanding this My declaration of love, in giving My Body and Blood for you, there is one here present who shall betray Me.'

èπὶ τ. τρ., viz. in dipping into the dish with the Lord. πορεύεται] A somewhat similar πορεύεσθαι to this occurs ch. xiii. 33; but that is used of our Lord's ministerial progress; this of His progress through suffering to glory.

24—30.] DISPUTE FOR PRE-EMINENCE. OUR LORD'S REPLY. Without attempting to decide the question whether this ineident is strictly narrated in order of time, or identical with one of those strifes on this point related Matt. xviii. 1; xx. 20, I will offer one or two remarks on it as it here stands. (1) Its having happened at this time is not altogether unaccountable.

They had been just enquiring among themselves (ver. 23), who among them should do this thing. May it not reasonably be supposed, that some of them (Judas at least) would be anxiously employed in self-justification, and that this would lead, in some part of the table, to a dispute of the kind here introduced? The natural effect of the Lord's rebuke would be to give rise to a different spirit among them, and the question "Lord, is it I?" may have been the offspring of this better mind; -but see note on Matt. vv. 20-25. (2) It is surprising to find the very declaration of our Lord on the former strife related in this Gospel (ch. ix. 46-48), repeated as having been made at this Paschal meal, - by John (xiii. 20). May not this lead us to suppose that there has been a transposition of some of the circumstances regarding these various contentions among the Apostles, and that these words occurring in John may possibly point to a strife of this kind? (3) The ἐγώ εἰμι έν μέσφ ύμῶν ὡς ὁ διακονῶν is too clear an allusion to the washing of their feet by the Lord, to have escaped even those Commentators who are slow to discern such hints (e. g. De Wette). The appeal, if it had taken place, is natural and intelligible; but not otherwise. (4) The diction is repeatedly allusive to their then employment: ἀνακείμενος — διατίθεμαι — ἔσθειν καὶ πίνειν – ἐν τῆ βασιλεία μου—all these have reference to things present, or words spoken, during that meal.

I therefore infer that the strife did happen at this time, in the order related here.

25.] See on Matt. xx. 25. The expression here of έξουσ. αὐτ. εὐεργ. καλ. also seems to be connected with what had just taken place. 'Among them, the εὐεργέται are those who ἐξουσιάζουσιν αὐτῶν—but among you, I, your εὐεργέτης (see vv. 19, 20, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, bis), do not so, but am in the midst of you as your servant.'

Ptolemy εὐεργέτης at once occurs to us;—numerous other examples are given by Wetstein. 26.] οὕτως, i. e. ἔσεσθε.

27.] Compare John xiii. 13—17.
28.] These words could hardly have been spoken except on this occasion, when τὸ περὶ ἐμοῦ τέλος ἔχει, ver. 37.

29, 30.] See above, and note on Matt. xix. 28, see also Rev. ii. 27. The word βασιλείαν belongs to both verbs—not, 'I appoint to you (as my Father hath appointed to me a kingdom) that ye

31-34. APPEAL TO PETER: HIS CON-FIDENCE, AND OUR LORD'S REPLY. (See Matt. xxvi. 30-35: Mark xiv. 26-31: John xiii. 36-38.) The speech appears to proceed continuously. There are marks in these words of our Lord, of close connexion with what has gone before. His way which the Father διέθετο to Him, is to His kingdom—but it is through πειρασμοί. To these, who have been with Him in these trials, He διατίθεται βασιλείαν,but His way to it must be their way, and here is the $\pi \epsilon i \rho \alpha \sigma \mu \delta s$,—the sifting as wheat. The sudden address to Simon may perhaps have been occasioned by some remark of his, - or, which I think more probable, may have been made in consequence of some part taken by him in the preceding strife for precedence. Such sudden and earnest addresses spring forth from deep love and concern awakened for another. 31. ἐξητήσ.] Not only 'hath desired to have you,' E. V., but hath obtained you;—'his desire is granted.'

ύμας—all. This must include Judas, though it does not follow that he was present—the sifting separated the chaff from the wheat, which chaff he was, see Amos ix. 9. 32.] ἐγὰ δὲ ἐδ. π. σοῦ] As Peter was the foremost (the rest are here addressed through him), so he was in the greatest danger. It must not be supposed that our Lord's prayer was not heard, because Peter's faith did fail, in his denial: ἐκλίπη implies a total extinction which Peter's faith did not suffer.

Though the bus included Judas, he is not included in the prayer: see John xvii. 6—12. We may notice here, that our Lord speaks of the total failure of even an Apostle's faith, as possible.

έπιστρέψας There can, I think, be little doubt that this word is here used in the general N. T. sense, of returning as a penitent after sin, turning to God; and not in the almost expletive meaning which it has in such passages as Ps. lxxxiv. 6, δ θεός, σὺ ἐπιστρέψας ζωώσεις ήμας (although even here it may have a somewhat similar sense to the above—see Joel ii. 14: Acts vii. 42). στήρισον] The use of this word and the cognate substantive thrice by Peter in his two epistles (see reff.), and in the first passage in a connexion with the mention of Satan's 33, 34. temptations, is remarkable. Whether these words are in close connexion with the preceding, may I think be doubted. They may represent the same reply of our Lord as we have recorded in John xiii. 38. One thing seems clear, without any attempt at minutely harmonizing: that two announcements were made by our Lord to Peter of his future denial, occasioned by two very different professions of his. One, -during the last meal, i. e. before going out, and occasioned by Peter's professed readiness to go to prison and to death (= to lay down his life) for and with the Lord:—the other,—on the way to the Mount of Olives, after the declaration that all should be offended, and occasioned by Peter's profession that though all should be offended, yet would not he. Nothing is more natural or common than the repetition, by the warm-hearted and ardent, of professions like these, in spite of warning : -and when De Wette calls such an interpretation eine Nothhulfe, all that we can say is to disclaim any wish to clear up difficulties, except by going into their depths and examining them honestly and diligently. If the above view be correct, I conceive that the account in John of this profession and our Lord's answer, being in strict coherence, and arising out of the subject of conversation, must be taken as the exact one: and Luke must be supposed to have inserted them here without being aware of the intermediate remarks which led to them. This is the only place in the Gospels where our Lord addresses Peter by the name Hétpe. And it is remarkable as occurring in the very place where He forewarns him of his approaching denial of Himself.

35-38. FOREWARNING OF PERILS AT HAND. Peculiar to Luke. The meaning of our Lord in this much controverted passage appears to be, to forewarn the Apostles of the outward dangers which will await them henceforward in their mission :- unlike the time when He sent them forth without earthly appliances, upheld by His special Providence, they must now make use of common resources for sustenance, yea and even of the sword itself for defence. This they misunderstand, and point to the two swords which they have, -for which they are rebuked 35.] See ch. ix. 3; x. (see below). 4; also Matt. x. 9. 36. a a peir was the very word used in the prohibition be-There is a question what should be supplied after μη έχων. Very many authorities make μάχαιραν understood (as in E. V.);—but the simpler construction and better sense is to place μη έχων in contrast with exwv, he who has a purse, &c., and he who has none, let him &c., see reff. Thus the sense will be complete -for he who has a purse, can buy a sword, without selling his garment. μάχαιρα must be here used in the sense of a sword, -compare ver. 49:- and not a knife to eat with, which some have understood. The 'sword of the Spirit' (Olshausen and others) is wholly out of the question. The saying is both a description to them of their altered situation with reference to the world without, and a declaration that self-defence and self-provision would henceforward be necessary. It forms a decisive testimony, from the mouth of the Lord Himself, against the views of the Quakers and some other sects on these points. But it does not warrant aggression by Christians, nor, as some R. Catholics (see the bull "Unam sanctam" of

By the very form of the expression it is evident, that the sword alluded to could have no referthe sword anidet to could have no reference to that night's danger, or the defending Him from it. το περὶ έμ. τέλος ἔχει] The prophecy cited closes the section of Isaiah, which eminently predicts the Lord's sufferings (ch. lii. 13—liii. 12). τὸ περὶ ἐμοῦ—supply γεγραμμένον, or perhaps more generally, 'determined in the counsel of God.'

τέλος έχει does not merely mean 'must be fulfilled,' which would be an assertion without any special reference here-but (as E. V.) have an end; -are coming to the completion of their accomplishment. So τετέλεσται, John xix. 30. Two of them were armed,-either from excess of zeal to defend Him, excited by His announcement of His sufferings during this feast,-or perhaps because they had brought their weapons from Galilee as protection by the way. The road from Jericho to Jerusalem (see ch. x. 30) was much infested with robbers :- and it was the custom for the priests, and even the quiet and ascetic Essenes, to carry weapons when travelling. Chrysostom (Hom. in Matt. lxxxiv. vol. vii. p. 797) gives a curious explanation of the two swords: εἰκὸς οὖν καὶ μαχαίρας εἶναι ἐκεῖ διὰ τὸ ἀρνίον. This certainly agrees with the number of the disciples sent to get ready the Passover: but it has nothing else to recommend it. They exhibit their swords, misunderstanding His words and supposing them to apply to that night. Our Lord breaks off the matter with ikavov corte,-'It is enough;' not 'they are sufficient;'—but, It is well,—we are sufficiently provided—'it was not to this that My words referred.' The rebuke is parallel with, though milder than, the one in Mark viii. 17,-as the misunderstanding was somewhat similar.

serts the very important additional details of vv. 44, 45, besides the particularity of ως ελ λίθου βολήν, ver. 41. is not to be rendered 'utinam,' but 'si,' and the sentence is broken off at emov: thus rendering the meaning equivalent to a wish. Some suppose παρενεγκείν to be an inf. for an imperative, but incorrectly.

43.] The principal testimonies of the Fathers, &c. against and for vv. 43, 44, are collected in the digest. With the early and weighty evidence there cited in favour of the passage, it is impossible that it should have been an apocryphal insertion. It was perhaps, as Epiph. states of ἔκλαυσε, expunged by the orthodox, who imagined they found in it an inconsistency with the divine nature of our Lord. We have reason to be thankful, that orthodoxy has been better understood The strengthening by means of the angel is physical-and the appearance likewise. See an interesting reply to the scoffs of Julian on this point, in Theodore of Mopsuestia, in loc. ed. Migne, p. 723. It is strange how Olshausen can have so far deceived himself as to imagine that ἄφθη αὐτῷ can imply a merely inward and spiritual accession of strength from above. It is strange likewise that the analogy of the ministration of angels in the Lord's former temptation should not have occurred to those modern Commentators who have objected to this circumstance as improbable. strengthening probably took place between the first and the second prayer; and the effect of it is the ἐκτενέστερον προςηύχετο of ver. 44, and the entire resignation expressed in the second and third prayer of Matthew's narrative.

44. The intention of the Evangelist seems clearly to be, to convey the idea that the sweat was (not fell like, but was) like drops of blood; -i. e. coloured with blood,-for so I understand the wsei, as just distinguishing the drops highly coloured with blood, from pure blood. Aristotle, speaking of certain morbid states of the blood, says, έξυγραινομένου δε λίαν νοσοῦσιν γίνεται γαρ ίχωροειδές, και διορροῦται, οὕτως ὥςτε ήδη τινες ίδισαν αἰματώδη ίδρῶτα, Hist. Anim. iii. 19. To suppose that it only fell like drops of blood (why not drops of any thing else? and drops of blood from what, and where?)

is to nullify the force of the sentence, and make the insertion of almatos not only superfluous but absurd. We must not forget, in asking on what testimony this rests, that the marks of such drops would be visible after the termination of the agony. An interesting example of a sweat of blood under circumstances of strong terror, accompanied by loss of speech, is given in an article by Dr. Schneider in Casper's Wochenschrift for 1848: and cited in the Medical Gazette for December of that year. τῆς λύπης—the effect of anxiety and watching. The words may possibly express an inference of the Evangelist (Meyer): but I would rather understand them as exactly describing the cause of their sleeping.

Our narrative is here distinguished even more than before by minute and striking details (see on the whole the notes to Matt.). lately (Matt. ver. 45: Mark ver. 41) and so often (Matt. xxvi. 2; xx. 18; xvii. 22) Another is in ver. been announced. 49, where the disciples seeing τὸ ἐσόμενον, ask Κύριε, εἰ πατάξ. ἐν μαχαίρη; which question refers to, and is the filling up of their misunderstanding of our Lord in ver. 38. Again ver. 51 is peculiar to 51. | έατε εως τούτου I understand as addressed, not to the disciples, but to the multitude, or rather to those who were holding Him; -His hands were held,-and He says, Suffer, permit me, thus far: i. e. to touch the ear of the wounded person. If this interpretation be correct, it furnishes an additional token of the truthfulness of our narrative-for the previous laying hold of Jesus has not been mentioned here, but in Matthew (ver. 50) and Mark (ver. 46). 53.] There is an important addition here to the other reports of our Lord's speech; — ἀλλὰ . . . σκότους. It stands here instead of the declaration that this was done that the Scriptures might be fulfilled (Matt. ver. 56: Mark ver. 49). The inner sense of those words is indeed implied here—but we cannot venture to say that our report is of the Our Lord here dissame saying. tinguishes between the power exercised over Him by men, and that by the Ecil One:-but so as to make the ¿ξουσία which rules over them to be that of darkness-while His own assertion of this shews that all was by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. the court, as some Commentators have done. But even were such an enquiry necessary, I see no difficulty in answering it. The anathemas of Peter, spoken to οί παρεστώτες with vehemence, and the crowing of the cock,—were not these audible? But our Lord needed not these to attract His attention.

63-65. HE IS MOCKED. Luke does not, as some Commentators say, place this mocking before the trial in Caiaphas's house, but in the same place as Matt. vv. 67, 68, and Mark ver. 65, viz. after what happened there. The trial he omits altogether, having found no report of it. How those who take this view of Luke's arrangement can yet suppose him to have had Matt. and Mark before him while writing, I am wholly at a loss to conceive.

66-71.] HEARING BEFORE THE COUN-CIL. (Probably) Matt. xxvii. 1. Mark xiv. 1. It seems probable that Luke here gives us an account of a second and formal judgment held in the morning. The simi. larity of the things said at the two hearings may be accounted for by remembering that they were both more or less formal processes in legal courts, one the precognition, the other, the decision, at which the things said before would be likely to be nearly repeated. έγ. ήμ.] Some trace of a meeting of the Sanhedrim after daylight I believe our Evangelist to have found, see Matt. xxvii. 1—and to have therefore related as then happening, the following account of what really took place at the former meeting.

CHAP. XXIII. 1-5.7 HE IS ACCUSED BEFORE PILATE. Matt. xxvii. 2, 11--14. Mark xv. 1-5. John xviii. 28-38. Our account, not entering at length into the words said, gives a particular and original narrative of the things transacted at this interview. 2. This charge was intended to represent the result of their previous judgment, ευραμεν; -whereas, in fact, no such matter had been before them : but they falsely allege it before Pilate, knowing that it was the point on which his judgment was likely to be most severe. The words themselves which they use are not so fulse, as the spirit, and impression which they convey. The κωλύοντα φ. Κ. διδ. was, however, false entirely (see ch. xx. 22 ff.); and is just one of those instances where those who are determined to effect their purpose by falsehood, do so, in spite of the fact having been precisely the contrary to that which they assert.

3.] This question is related in all four Gospels. But in John the answer is widely different from the distinct affirmation in the other three, amounting perhaps to it in substance-at all events affirming that He was 'a King'—which was the form of their charge. I believe therefore that the Three give merely the general import of the Lord's answer, which John relates in full. It is hardly possible, if Jesus had affirmed the fact so strongly and barely as the Three relate it, that Pilate should have made the avowal in ver. 4-which John completely explains. 4.] The preceding question had been asked within the prætoriuma fact which our narrator does not adduce, - representing the whole as a continuous conversation in presence of the Jews: see John, ver. 38. We may remark (and on this see Matt., ver. 18: Mark, ver. 10) that Pilate must have known well that a man who had really done that, whereof Jesus was accused, would be no such object of hatred to the Sanhedrim. knowledge was doubtless accompanied (as the above-cited verses imply) with a previous acquaintance with some of the sayings and doings of Jesus, from which Pilate had probably formed his own opinion that He was no such King as His foes would represent Him. This is now confirmed by His own words (as related by John); and Pilate wishes to dismiss Him, finding no fault in Him. Possibly they thought of the matter mentioned ch. xiii. 1, in introducing Galilee into their charge. έπίσχ. they strengthened, redoubled, the charge -or perhaps intransitive, they became larity, first attempts to get rid of the matter altogether by sending his prisoner to Herod, on occasion of this word Galilee. This was Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa (see ch. iii. 1 and note on Matt. xiv. 1), who had come up to keep the feast. 7. ἀνέπεμψεν] "Propriam Romani juris vocem usurpavit. Nam remittitur reus qui alicubi comprehensus mittitur ad judicem aut originis aut habitationis. Itaque Pilatus Herodi, ut Tetrarchie ejus loci unde esse Jesus dicebatur, potestatem permisit Jesum abducendi in Galilæam, ibique, si vellet, cognoscendi de ejus causa: ut fieri inter Romanos provinciarum rectores solebat." J. iii. 10. 10), allowed Agrippa to dispose of those 8, 9.7 The έκ της έαυτου βασιλείας. reason of our Lord's silence is sufficiently shewn, in the account of Herod's feelings at seeing Him. "Noluit Christus miraculis et sermonibus, ut non ad auditorum curiositatem aut propriam jactantiam, ita nec ad suam ipsius a morte liberationem uti." Drusius. 10.] The accusations, of worldly kingship and of blasphemy, would probably be here united, as Herod was a Jew, and able to appreciate the latter. 11.] στρατ. are the body-guard in attendance upon Herod.

έσθῆτα λαμπρ.] Variously interpreted:—either purple, as befitting a king,—and why should this not be the very χλαμός κοκκίνη afterwards used by Pilate's soldiers (Matt. xxvii. 28; Ιμάτιον πορφυροῦν, John xix. 2)?—οτ white, as λαμπρ. is rendered by some (but see note), Acts x. 30.

12.] The cause of the quarrel is uncertain: apparently something concerning Herod's power of jurisdiction, which was conceded by Pilate in this sending Jesus to him, and again waived by Herod in sending Him back again. From chap. xiii. 1, Pilate appears to have encroached on that jurisdiction. The remarks of some Commentators about their uniting in enmity against Christ (so even, recently, Wordsworth), are quite beside the purpose. The present feeling of Pilate was any thing but hostile to the person of Christ; and Herod, by his treatment of Him, shews that he thought Him beneath his judicial notice. This remission of Jesus to Herod seems not to have been known to either of the other three Evangelists. It is worthy of notice that they all relate the mocking by the soldiers of Pilate, which Luke omits,—whereas he gives it as taking place before Herod. This is one of the very few cases where the nature of the history shews that both happened.

John, if he composed his Gospel with that of Luke before him, have here given us a narrative in which so important a fact as this is not only not related, but absolutely cannot find any place of insertion? Its real place is after John ver. 38;—but obviously nothing was further from the mind of that Evangelist, for he represents Pilate as speaking continuously.

13—25.] FURTHER HEARING BEFORE PILATE, WHO STRIVES TO RELEASE HIM, BUT ULTIMATELY YIELDS TO THE JEWS. Matt. xxvii. 15—26. Mark xv. 6—15. John xviii. 39, 40. Our account, while entirely distinct in form from the others, is in substance nearly allied to them. In a few points it approaches John very nearly, compare ver. 18 with John ver. 40, also ἕνα ver. 17, with John ver. 39. The second declaration of our Lord's innocence by Pilate is in John's account united with the first, ver. 38. In the three first Gospels, as asserted in our ver. 14, the questioning takes place in the presence of the Jews: not so, however, in John (see xviii. 28).

These were not the women who had followed Him from Galilee, but the ordinary crowd collected in the streets on such occasions, and consisting, as is usually the case (and especially at an execution), principally of women. Their weeping appears to have been of that kind of wellmeant sympathy which is excited by any affecting sight, such as that of an innocent person delivered to so cruel a death. This description need not of course exclude many who may have wept from deeper and more personal motives, as having heard Him teach, or received some benefit of healing from Him, or the like.

B. J. vi. 9. 4. But the words are too solemn, and too often used in a more awful connexion, for a further meaning to escape our notice: see Isa. ii. 10, 19, 21, and Rev. vi. 16, where is the striking expression ἀπὸ τῆς ὀργῆς τοῦ apriou-of Him who now was the victim about to be offered. And the whole warning-as every other respecting the destruction of Jerusalem-looks through the type to the antitype, the great day of His wrath. Now, έρχονται ήμέραι—then ήλθεν ή ήμέρα ή μεγάλη της ὀργης αὐτοῦ, Rev. vi. 17. It is interesting to see how often David, who had passed so long in hiding among the rocks of the wilderness from Saul, calls the Lord his Rock (see Ps. xviii. 2, 46; xlii. 9, &c.). They who have this defence, will not need to call on the rocks to hide them.

31. This verse—the solemn close of our Lord's teaching on earth-compares His own sufferings with that awful judgment which shall in the end overtake sinners, the unrepentant human kind-the dry tree. These things-ταῦτα-were a judgment on sin ;-He bore our sins ;-He,the vine, the green tree, the fruit-bearing tree, - of Whom His people are the branches, - if He, if they in Him and in themselves, are so treated, so tried with sufferings,-what shall become of them who are cast forth as a branch and are withered? Read 1 Pet. iv. 12-18; -ver. 18 is a paraphrase of our text. Theophylact's comment is excellent: ei ταῦτα ποιοῦσιν ἐν ἐμοὶ ἐγκάρπφ καὶ ἀειθαλεί καὶ ἀειζώφ διὰ τὴν θεότητα, τί γένηται έν ύμιν ακάρποις και πάσης δικαιοσύνης ζωοποιου έστερημένοις; The explanations which make the greentree = the young, and the dry = the old (Bengel), -or the green-tree = the women, comparatively innocent, the dry = the guilty (Baumgarten-Crusius), at the destruction of Jerusalem-seem to me unworthy of the place which the words hold, though the latter agrees with the symbolism of Ezek. xx. 47, compared with xxi. 4. 32.] The digest shews that the reading έτεροι κακούργοι δύο has diplomatically almost as great claims to be the true one as that in the text: and if we take the probabilities of alteration into account, it has even stronger claims. Of course it can bear but one meaning -two other malefactors. That this should have been substituted for ETEPOL δύο κακούργοι, which may mean two other, malefactors (as rendered in E. V.), is simply inconceivable; that the transposition took place vice versa, is highly probable. This having now appeared by the additional evidence of the Codex Sinaiticus, it is impossible to annotate as was done in my earlier Editions.

immediately that the crosses were set up. Now first, in the fullest sense, from the wounds in His Hands and Feet, is His Blood shed, εἰς ἄφεσιν ἀμαρτιῶν (Matt. xxvi. 28), and He inaugurates His intercessional office by a prayer for His murderers, — ἄφες αὐτοῖς. This also is a fulfilment of Scripture, Isa. liii. 12;—where the contents of our verses 33, 34 are remarkably pointed out.

His teaching ended at ver. 31. His High-Priesthood is now begun. His first three sayings on the Cross are for others: see ver. 43: John xix. 26, 27.

πάτερ He is the Son of God, and He speaks in the fulness of this covenant έγω ήδειν ότι πάντοτέ μου άκούεις: -it is not merely a prayer-but the prayer of the Great Intercessor, which is always heard. Notice that though on the Cross, there is no alienation, no wrath of condemnation, between the Father and άφες αὐτοῖς—who are here the Son. intended? Doubtless, first and directly, the four soldiers, whose work it had been to crucify Him. The molovour points directly at this: and it is surely a mistake to suppose that they wanted no forgiveness, because they were merely doing their duty. Stier remarks, "This is only a misleading fallacy, for they were sinners even as others, and their obedient and unsuspecting performance of their duty was not without a sinful pleasure in doing it, or at all events formed part of their entire standing as sinners, included in that sin of the world, to which the Lord here ascribes His Crucifixion" (vi. 403, edn. 2). But not only to them, but to them as the representatives of that sin of the world, does this prayer apply. The nominative to ποιούσιν is οἱ ἄνθρωποιmankind,-the Jewish nation, as the next moving agent in His death,-but all of us, inasmuch as for our sins He was bruised. ού γάρ οίδασιν τί ποιουσιν, primarily, as before, spoken of the soldiers,-then of the council, who delivered Him up, see John xi. 49, δμεῖς ούκ οίδατε οὐδέν,-then of all, whose sin is from lack of knowledge of the truth, of what sin is, and what it has done-even the crucifixion of the Lord. But certainly from this intercession is excluded that one sin-strikingly brought out by the passage thus cited as committed by him who said it, viz. Caiaphas, and hinted at again by our Lord, John xix. 11-and perhaps also by the awful answer Matt. xxvi. 64, σù είπας—'thou saidst it'viz. in prophecy, John xi. 49: see also Matt. xxvi. 25,-and on the sin alluded to, Matt. xii. 31: 1 John v. 16. that between the two members of this prayer lies the work of the Spirit leading to repentance—the prayer that they may have their eyes opened, and know what they have done: which is the necessary subjective condition of forgiveness of sins, see 2 Tim. ii. 25, 26. 35.] The insults of the people are by no means excluded, even with συν αυτοις omitted: nay they are implied, by the de kal which To find a discrepancy with follows. Matt. and Mark here, is surely unfair (Meyer, De Wette): - the people's standing looking on, does not describe their mind towards Jesus: Luke reports no more than he had before him: and the inference may be drawn that those whom he has related to have cried out an hour ago, 'Crucify him,'—would not have stood by in silence. do), seeing that 41. hueis He classes himself with the other in condemnation, but not in his prayer afterἄτοπον, unseemly. is a remarkable testimony to the innocence of Jesus from one who was probably executed for his share in those very tumults which He was accused of having 42.] The thief had heard of the announcements which Jesus had made,—or at all events of the popular rumour concerning his Kingdom. His faith lays hold on the truth that this is the King of the Jews in a higher and immortal sense. There is nothing so astounding in this man's faith dogmatically considered, as De Wette thinks; he merely joins the common belief of the Jews of a Messianic Kingdom, in which the ancient Fathers were to rise, &c.,—with the conviction, that Jesus is the Messiah. What is really astounding, is the power and strength of that faith, which, amidst shame and pain and mockery, could thus lift itself to the apprehension of the Crucified as this King. This thief would fill a conspicuous place in a list of the triumphs of faith supplementary to Heb. xi. βασ.] The Vulgate, which is followed by Luther,—and the E. V.,—renders this as if it were είς την βασ. (see var. readd.), which is a sad mistake, as it destroys the force of the expression. It is in thy Kingdom—with thy Kingdom, so $\xi \lambda \theta \eta$, $\xi \nu$ $\tau \hat{\eta}$ $\delta \delta \xi \eta$ $\alpha \delta \tau \sigma \hat{\nu}$, Matt. xxv. 31, which we (E.V.) have translated rightly. The above mistake entirely loses ελθης-making it merely 'comest into,' just as we say to 'come into' an estate: whereas it is the chief word in the clause, and έν τῆ β. σου its qualification, at Thy coming in Thy Kingdom. It will be seen that there is no necessity for supposing the man to have been a disciple, as some have done.

It is remarkable how, in three following sayings, the Lord appears as Prophet, Priest, and King: as Prophet, to the daughters of Jerusalem ;- as Priest, interceding for forgiveness; -as King, acknowledged by the penitent thief, and answering his prayer. 43. aunv σοι λέγω The Lord surpasses his prayer in the answer; the αμήν σοι λέγω, σήμερον, is the reply to the uncertain όταν of the thief. σήμερον] this day: before the close of this natural day. The attempt to join it with σοι λέγω, considering that it not only violates common sense, but destroys the force of our Lord's promise, is surely something worse than silly: see below.
μετ' ἐμοῦ ἔση can bear no other meaning than thou shalt be with Me, in the ordinary sense of the words, 'I shall be in Paradise, and thou with Me.' ἐν τῷ παρ.] On these words rests the whole exegesis of the saying. What is this PARADISE? The word is used of the garden of Eden by the LXX, Gen. ii. 8, &c., and subsequently became, in the Jewish theology, the name for that part of Hades, the abode of the dead, where the souls of the righteous await the resurrection. It was also the name for a supernal or heavenly abode, see reff. N. T. The former of these is, I believe, here primarily to be understood; -but only as introductory, and that immediately, to the latter. By the death of Christ only was Paradise first opened, in the true sense of the word. He Himself, when speaking of Lazarus (ch. xvi. 22), does not place him in Paradise, but in Abraham's bosom-in that place which the Jews called Paradise, but by an anticipation which our Lord did not sanction. I believe the matter to have been thus. Our Lord spoke (as Grotius has remarked) to the thief so as He knew the thief would understand Him; but He spoke with a fuller and more blessed meaning than he could understand then. For that day, on that very evening, was 'Paradise' truly 'regained'-opened by the death of Christ. We know (1 Pet. iii. 18, 19, where see note; iv. 6) that our Lord went down into the depths of death,-announced His triumph (for His death was His triumph) to the imprisoned spirits, -and in that moment-for change of state, to the disembodied, is all that change of place implies—they perhaps were in the Paradise of God,—in the blessed heavenly place, implied by the word, 2 Cor. xii. That this is not fulness of glory as yet, is evident;—for the glorified body is not that the state of the state o yet joined to their spirits,—they are not yet perfect (Heb. xi. 40); but it is a degree of bliss compared to which their former degree was but as imprisonment.

This work of the Lord I believe to have been accomplished on the instant of His death, and the penitent to have followed Him at his death-some little time after-into the Paradise of God. That our Lord returned to take his glorified Body, was in accordance with His design, and He became thereby the first-fruits of the holy dead, who shall like Him put on the body of the resurrection, and be translated from disembodied and imperfect bliss in the Paradise of God, to the perfection of glorified humanity in His glory, and with Him, not in Paradise, but at God's 44-46. Our account right hand. is very short and epitomizing-containing however, peculiar to itself, the last word The impresof our Lord on the cross. sion conveyed by this account, if we had no other, would be that the veil was rent before the death of Jesus; - but the more detailed account of Matthew corrects this.

45. The words ἐσκοτ. ὁ ἥλ. are probably added to give solemnity to the preceding, assigning its reason; so that the gloss του ήλ. ἐκλείποντος shews a right apprehension of the words. It can hardly be, as Mey., that the earth was darkened till the ninth hour, and then the sun be-46. The use of came dark also. φωνη μεγάλη shews that this was the cry to which Matt. and Mark allude. The words are from the LXX, varying however from the common reading παραθήσομαι, and giving the verb in the present, which is also the rendering of the Hebrew (אַפַקּיד).

These words have in them an important and deep meaning. They accompany that, which in our Lord's case was strictly speaking the act of death. It was His own act-not 'feeling the approach of death,' as some, not apprehending the matter, have commented; but a determinate delivering up of His spirit to the Father. - παρέδωκεν τὸ πνεῦμα, John: see John x. 18-οὐδεὶς αἴρει αὐτὴν ἀπ' ἐμοῦ, άλλ' έγω τίθημι αὐτὴν ἀπ' έμαυτοῦ. None of the Evangelists say 'He died:' although that expression is ever after used of His death stated as one great fact : - but it is, ἀφηκεν τὸ πν., Matt.; ἐξέπνευσεν, Mark, Luke; παρέδωκεν το πνεύμα, John.

The πνευμα here is the Personality -the human soul informed by the Spirit, in union: not separated, so that His soul went to Hades, and His spirit to the Father (Olshausen). Both are delivered into the hand of the Father-by Whom quickened (but ζωοποιηθείς πνεύματι of 1 Pet. iii. 18 is to be rendered 'quickened in the spirit'-by the Father is understood in ζωοποιηθείς) He worked His great victory over death and Hell. See again 1 Pet. iii. 18, 19, and notes, and Rom. viii. 10, The latter part of the verse in Ps. xxxi., 'for Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, thou God of truth,' is not applicable here. The whole Psalm is not strictly prophetic, but is applied by the Lord 47-49.] Our account, as well as that of Mark, ascribes the impression made on the centurion to that which took place at the death of Jesus, -i. e. ὅτι οὖτως ἐξέπνευσεν. Something in the manner and words convinced him that this man was the Son of God; which expression he uses doubtless with reference to what he had before heard, but especially to the words just uttered— " Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." Luke has not expressed the words exactly the same,—but the E. V. has wrongly and ungrammatically rendered what he relates the centurion to have said. and made 'a righteous man' (Luke) stand in the place of 'the Son of God' (Mark); -whereas they only give the general sense of the persuasion of the centurion. Truly, this man was innocent :- and if innocent (nay, more, δίκαιος, just, truthful), He was the Son of God, for He had asserted it. 48.] Peculiar to Luke. τὰ γενόμενα are the darkness and other prodigies, after which we have no more raillery :- men's tempers are changed, and we here see the result. τύπτοντές . . . a sign of self-accusation, at least for the time,-which is renewed on the preaching of Peter, Acts ii. 37. 49. 4.] ἐπέστ. does not determine the position of the angels. It is merely came upon them under ordinary circumstances ;- appeared to them, in a supernatural connexion: see reff. On the two angels here, see note on Mark ver. 5; to which I will just add, that the Harmonistic view, as represented by Greswell [Diss. vi., vol. 3], strangely enough puts together the angel in Matthew,

Here it is said to the women, as being from Galilee, see ch. xxiii. 55-and meaning, 'when He was yet with you.' 9. See note on 10.] It seems as if the Mark ver. 8. testimony of one of the disciples who went to Emmaus had been the ground of the whole former part - perhaps of the whole -of this chapter. We find consequently this account exactly agreeing with his report afterwards, ver. 23, 24. Joanna was the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, ch. viii. 2. On Μαρία [ή] 'Ιακώβου, and the questions connected with it, see Prolegg. to Vol. IV. ch. ii. § i. 4. The meaning of $\pi\rho\delta s$ $\dot{\epsilon}\alpha\nu\tau\dot{\nu}$, as belonging to $\dot{\alpha}\pi\dot{\eta}\lambda\theta\epsilon\nu$ and not to $\theta\alpha\nu\mu\dot{\alpha}\zeta\omega\nu$, is fixed by the expression in John, l. c.

13-35.] JESUS APPEARS TO TWO OF

THE DISCIPLES AT EMMAUS. Peculiar to Luke:—the incident (but from another source) is alluded to in the fragmentary addition to Mark xvi. (ver. 12). 13.] έξ αὐτῶν, not of the Apostles—the lastmentioned were οἱ ἕνδεκα καὶ πάντες οἱ λοιποί, ver. 9: see also ver. 22, ἐξ ἡμῶν. One of them, ver. 18, was called Kleopas (= Κλεόπατρος, probably a different name (= Κλεόπατρος, probably a different name from Κλωπᾶς, John xix. 25 (τὸπ): see note on Matt. x. 3). Who the other was, is idle to conjecture. Origen, in several places, calls him Simon; apparently from having read λέγοντες in ver. 34, and referring ἄφθη τ. Σ. to the present appearance. Epiphanius says it was Nathanael; Theophylact, Luke himself. This may snew what such reports are worth. Wieseler (Chron. vol. i. p. 431) believes the two to have been, James the son of Alphæus or Clopas or Cicopas (but see above) journeying with his father, and the appearance on the road to Emmaus to be the same as ἄφθη Ἰακώβφ, 1 Cor. xv. 7.

Our narrative seems to have been from the report of Cleopas. 'Εμμαούς] Joseph., B. J. vii. 6. 6, mentions this Emmaus as sixty stades from Jerusalem. There were two other places of the same name: (1) a town afterwards called Nicopolis, twenty-two Romau miles from Jerusalem, where Judas Maccabæus defeated the Syrian general Gorgias: see 1 Macc. iii. 40—57. (2) Another Emmaus is mentioned Jos. B. J. iv. 1. 3, πρὸ τῆς τιβεριάδος—where he adds, μεθερμηνευσμένη δὲ 'Αμμαοῦς θερμὰ λέγοιτ' ἄν, ἔστι γὰρ ἐν αὐτῆ πηγὴ θερμῶν ὑδάτων πρὸς ἄκεσιν ἐπιτήδειος. This was the case also with the other places of the name. Our Emmaus is now called Cubeibi (?).

He began with Moses first;-He began with each as He came to them. τὰ π. ἐαυτοῦ] De Wette remarks, "It were much to be wished that we knew what prophecies of the death and triumph of Jesus are here meant. There are but few that point to the subject." But I take the τὰ περὶ ἐαυτοῦ to mean something very different from mere prophetical passages. The whole Scriptures are a testimony to Him: the whole history of the chosen people, with its types, and its law, and its prophecies, is a shewing forth of Ilim: and it was here the whole, - magai ai yp.,-that He laid out before them. This general leading into the meaning of the whole, as a whole, fulfilled in Him, would be much more opportune to the place, and the time occupied, than a direct exposition of selected passages. The things concerning Himself (E. V.) is right: not, 'the parts concerning Him-Observe the testimony which this verse gives to the divine authority, and the Christian interpretation, of the O. T. It is not implied that He said any thing to indicate that He would go further-but simply, that He was passing on. "Our blessed Saviour pretended that He would pass forth beyond Emmaus: but if he intended not to do it, yet He did no injury to the two disciples, for whose good it was that He intended to make this offer: and neither did He prevaricate the strictness of simplicity and sincerity, because they were persons with whom He had made no contracts; to whom He had passed no obligation; and in the nature of the thing, it is proper and natural, by an offer, to give an occasion to another to do a good action: they lived at Emmaus; merely in the same 30.] I believe quarters with us. that there was something in the manner of His breaking the bread, and helping and giving it to them, which was his own appointed means of opening their eyes to the recognition of Him. But we must not suppose any reference to, much less any celebration of, the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Neither of these disciples was present at its institution (but see Wieseler's conjecture, which is at all events worth consideration, in note on ver. 13); and certainly it had never been celebrated since. With this simple consideration will fall to the ground all that Romanists have built on this incident, even to making it a defence of administration in one kind only. See Wordsw., who gives, in reply, a solution as artificial and unwarranted as the argument of the R. Catholics: shewing the danger of departing from the plan sense of Holy Scripture in search of fanciful allusions. The analogy of such a breaking and giving with His institution of that holy ordinance becomes lost, when we force the incident into an example of the ordinance itself. The Lord at their meal takes on Him the office of the master of the house (which alone would shew that it was not their house, but an inn), perhaps on account of the superior place which His discourse had won for Him in their estimation :- and as the Jewish rule was, that "three cating 'together were bound to give thanks"

(Berac. 45. 1, cited by Meyer), He fulfils this duty. In doing so, perhaps the wellknown manner of His taking bread, &c., perhaps the marks of the nails in His hands, then first noticed, or these together, as secondary means,-but certainly His own will and permission to be seen by them, opened their eyes to know Him.

31.] ἄφαντος, not αὐτοῖς, which would imply His Body to have remained, but invisible to them : but ἀπ' αὐτῶν, implying, besides the supernatural disappearance, a real objective removal from them.

32. Was there not something heart-kindling in His discourse by the way, which would have led us to suppose that it was none but the Lord Himself?' not that they did suppose it,—but the words are a sort of self-reproach for not having done so. Compare Matt. vii. 29. έλάλει ήμιν, as Bengel remarks, is more than συνελάλει ήμ.:--He spoke to us, not merely, 'with us,' as E. V. 33.] 'Jam non timent iter nocturnum, quod antea dissuaserant Bengel. The whole ignoto comiti.' eleven were not there-Thomas was not present, if at least the appearance which follows be the same as that in John xx. 19, which there seems no reason to doubt. Some have derived an argument from this incompleteness in their number, for the second of the travellers being also an Apostle: see above on ver. 13. Who these of συν αυτοίς are, we learn from 34. This appearance Acts i. 14. to Simon (i. c. Peter-the other Simon would not be thus named without explanation: see ch. v. 3 ff.) is only hinted at here,—but is asserted again, 1 Cor. xv. 5, in immediate connexion with that which here follows. It is not clear whether it took place before or after that on the way to Emmaus. 35. And they—the travellers, distinguished from the othersnot 'they also,' for thus we should leave the clause without a copula. κλ. We can hardly after έγνώσθη exclude that sense of in, which gives that which follows a share in the instrumentality: being the element, in and by means of which. The example cited by De Wette, èv τη ἀναστάσει, Matt. xxii. 28, for the sense, 'during the breaking,' &c. does not apply, inasmuch as in that case there is no verb: John xiii. 35 is far more to the point, and almost decides for the other sense. That this should have been so, does not exclude the supernatural opening of their eyes: see above, on ver. 31.

36-49. APPEARANCE OF JESUS TO THE DISCIPLES. Mark xvi. 14. John xx. 19-23. The identity of these appearances need hardly be insisted on. On Mark's narrative, see notes there. That of John presents no difficulties, on one supposition, -that he had not seen this of Luke. The particulars related by him are mostly additional, but not altogether so. έστη ἐν μέσφ-while they were speaking of these things,-possibly not entirely crediting the account, as seems hinted at in Mark xvi. 13,-the Lord appeared, the doors being shut, in the midst (John xx. 19 and notes). εἰρ. ὑμ., the ordinary Jewish salutation, שלום לכם, see ch. x. 5, but of more than ordinary meaning in the mouth of the Lord: see John xiv. 27.

Both views seem supported by the text, and I think both were united. The sight of the Hands and Feet, which they recognized as His, might at once convince them of the reality of the appearance, and the identity of the Person. The account of John confirms the idea that He shewed them the marks of the nails, both by His side being added, and by the expressions of Thomas which followed. The same seems also implied in our ver. 40.

The assertion of the Lord must not be taken as representing merely 'the popular notion concerning spirits' (Dr. Burton); He who is the Truth, does not speak thus of that which He knows, and has created. He declares to us the truth, that those appearances to which He was now likened by the disciples, and spirits in general, have not flesh and bones. Observe σάρκα κ. ὀστέα —but not αίμα. This the resurrection Body probably had not,—as being the animal life: see notes on John vi. 51, and John xx. 27. 41.] ἀπὸ τῆς χ., from their joy: the joy which they felt. The omission of the words kal κηρίου in the best MSS. is remarkable: see var. readd. It may possibly have arisen from an idea in some transcriber that this meal is the same as that in John xxi. 9. The words could hardly have been an interpolation. 44. Certainly, from the recurrence of $\delta \epsilon$, which implies immediate sequence, Luke, at the time of writing his Gospel, was not in possession of records of any Galilean appearances of the Lord, nor indeed of any later than this one. That he corrects this in Acts i., shews him meantime to have become acquainted with some other sources of information, not however perhaps including the Galilæan appearances (see Prolegg. to Luke, § iv. 2).
The following discourse apparently contains a summary of many things said during the last forty days before the ascension; -they cannot have been said on this evening; for after the command in ver. 49, the disciples would not have gone away into Galilee. Whether the Evangelist regarded it as a summary, is to me extremely doubtful. Knowing apparently of no Galilæan appearances, he seems to relate the command of ver. 49, both here and in the Acts, as intended to apply to the

47. ἀρξάμενοι] See reff. The substance of the preaching of the Gospel literally corresponded to this description—see Acts ii. 38: μετανοήσατε, καὶ βαπτισθήτω έκαστος ὑμῶν ἐπὶ τῷ ὀν. Ἰησοῦ χρ. εἰς ἄφεσιν ἀμορτιῶν,—were the words of the first sermon preached at Jerusalem.

έγω έξαποστ. The procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son is clearly here declared, as well as that from the Father. And consequently we find Peter, in Acts ii. 33, referring back to these very words, in ascribing the outpouring of the Spirit to the now exalted Saviour. In that verse, the $\epsilon \gamma \omega$ of this is filled up by $\tau \hat{\eta}$ $\delta \epsilon \xi_i \hat{a} \tau o \hat{v} \theta \epsilon o \hat{v} \psi \omega \theta \epsilon i s$ —the proper supplement of it here also. The promise itself is not found in the three Gospels, but expressly and frequently in John αποστέλλω, is not = a future, but implies that the actual work is done, and the state brought in, by which that sending is accomplished;—viz. the giving of the

The word 'Ispovo. is probably interpolated by some who, believing these words to represent the Galilæan discourse, placed it here for an explanation: or perhaps Acts i. 4 gave occasion to it. This command must have been (historically) uttered after the return from Galilee: see above. ένδύσ. Though the verb is used in the O. T. (see Judg. vi. 34: 2 Chron. xxiv. 20: 1 Chron. xii. 18) of inspiration by the Spirit, it here has its full meaning, of abiding upon and characterizing, as a garment does the person: this, as Stier remarks, was the true and complete clothing of the nakedness of the Fall. 50.] The Ascension appears to be related as taking place after the above words were spoken-but there is an uncertainty and want of specification about the narrative, which forbids us to conclude that it is intended as following immediately upon them. This however can only be said as taking the other Gospels and Acts i. into account :if we had none but the Gospel of Luke we should certainly say that the Lord as-cended after the appearance to the Apostles and others on the evening of the day of His resurrection. έξήγ. A few words must be appended here on a point which has been much stirred in Germany, even among the more orthodox Commentators; THE HISTORIC REALITY OF THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE ASCEN-SION. On those among them who doubt the fact of an Ascension at all, I have nothing to say, standing as I do altogether on different ground from them.

The Lord Himself foretold His Ascension, John vi. 62: xx. 17:-it was immediately after His disappearance from the earth expressly announced by the Apostles, Acts ii. 33, 34; v. 31:-and it continued to be an article of their preaching and teaching, 1 Pet. iii. 22: Eph. ii. 6; iv. 10: 1 Tim. iii. 16. So far should we have been assured of it, had we not possessed the testimonies of Luke, here and in the Acts:-for the fragment superadded to the Gospel of Mark merely states the fact, not the manner of it. But, to take first the a priori view, -is it probable that our Lord would have left so weighty a fact in His history on earth, without witnesses ! And might we not have concluded from the wording of John vi. 62, that our Lord must have intended an ascension in the sight of some of those to whom He spoke, and that the Evangelist himself gives that hint, by recording those words without comment, that he had seen Then again, is there any thing in the bodily state of our Lord after His resurrection which raises any even the least difficulty here? He appeared suddenly, and vanished suddenly, when He pleased; when it pleased Him, He ate, He spoke, He walked, but His Body was the Body of the Resurrection; only not vet his σώμα της δόξης (Phil. iii. 21), because He had not yet assumed that glory: but that He could assume it, and did assume it at His Ascension, will be granted by all who believe in Him as the Son of God. So that it seems, on à priori grounds, probable that, granted the fact of the Ascension, it did take place in some such manner as our accounts relate :- in the sight of the disciples, and by the uplifting of the risen Body of the Lord towards that which is to those on this earth the visible heaven. This being so, let us now, secondly, regard the matter à posteriori. We possess two accounts of the circumstances of this ascension, written by the same person, and that person a contemporary of the Apostles themselves. Of the genuineness of these accounts there never was a doubt. How improbable that Luke should have related what any Apostles or apostolic persons might have contradicted? How improbable that the universal Church, founded by those who are said to have been eyewitnesses of this event, should have received these two accounts as authentic, if they were not so? That these accounts themselves are never referred to in the Epistles, is surely no argument against If an occasion had arisen, such as necessitated the writing of 1 Cor. xv., there can be little doubt that St. Paul would have been as particular in the circumstances of the Ascension, as he has been in those of the Resurrection. The fact is, that by far the greatest difficulty remains to be solved by those who can imagine a myth or fiction on this subject to have arisen in the first age of the Church. Such a supposition is not more repugnant to our Christian faith and reverence, than it is to common sense and historical consistency.

Frag. CHAP. I. 1—18. Prologue: in which is Mosq. contained the substance and subject of the 1. 33. 69 whole Gospel. THE ETERNAL WORD OF GOD, THE SOURCE OF ALL EXISTENCE, LIFE, AND LIGHT, BECAME FLESH, DWELT AMONG US, WAS WITNESSED TO BY JOHN, REJECTED BY HIS OWN PEOPLE, BUT RE-CEIVED BY SOME, WHO HAD POWER GIVEN THEM TO BECOME THE SONS OF GOD. HE WAS THE PERFECTION AND END OF GOD'S REVELATION OF HIMSELF; WHICH WAS PARTIALLY MADE IN THE LAW, BUT

FULLY DECLARED IN JESUS CHRIST.

1-5. THE ETERNAL PRE-EXISTENCE OF THE LOYOS: HIS PERSONAL DISTINCT-NESS: BUT ESSENTIAL UNITY WITH GOD. HIS WORKING IN CREATION, AND IN THE ENLIGHTENING OF MEN BEFORE HIS MANIFESTATION IN THE FLESH; HIS NON-APPREHENSION BY THEM.

Before commenting on the truths here declared, it is absolutely necessary to discuss the one word on which the whole turns: viz. ὁ λόγος. This term is used by John without explanation, as bearing a meaning well known to his readers. The enquiry concerning that meaning must therefore be conducted on historical, not on mere grammatical grounds. And the most important elements of the enquiry are, (I.) the usage of speech as regards the word, by John himself and other biblical writers: and (II.) the purely historical information which we possess on the ideas attached to the word.

I. (a) From the first consideration we find, that in other biblical authors, as well as in John, the word is never used to signify the divine Reason or Mind; nor indeed those of any human creature. These ideas are expressed by πνεθμα or καρδία, or νους, or ή σοφία του θεου. the classics the word Adyos never signifies the subjective faculty of reason, but the reason to be given, objectively, of any thing or things. The usual Scripture meaning of hóyos is speech or word. ὁ λόγος τοῦ θ. is the creative, declarative, injunctive Word of God. (B) That this is also the import in our prologue, is manifest, from the evident relation which it bears to the opening of the history of creation in Genesis. & loyos is not an attribute of God, but an acting reality, by which the Eternal and Infinite is the great first cause of the created and finite.

(γ) Again this λόγος is undoubtedly in our prologue, personal :- not an abstraction merely, nor a personification,-not the speaking word of God, once manifested in the Prophets but afterwards fully declared in Christ, as Luthardt (i. 280 ff.), comparing our prologue with Heb. i. 1,—but a Person: for ὁ λόγος ην πρός τον θεόν, and δ λόγος σαρξ έγένετο: also θεὸς ην ὁ λόγος, not θεοῦ ην,-which certainly would be said of none but a Person. (δ) Moreover, the Abyos is identical with JESUS CHRIST, as the præ-existing Son of God. A comparison of vv. 14 and 15 will place this beyond doubt. (ϵ) And Jesus Christ is the Word of God, not because He speaks the word (as if $\delta \lambda \delta \gamma \sigma s = \delta \lambda \delta \gamma \omega \nu$, which is contrary to all usage, in which it = not δ λέγων, but το λεγόμενον);—nor because He is the One promised or spoken of, = δ λεγόμενος,—which is even less according to analogy;—nor because He is the Author and source of the Abyos as spoken in the Scriptures, &c., - any more than his being called ζωή and φωs implies only that He is the Giver of life and light: but because the Word dwells in and speaks from him, just as the Light dwells in and shines from, and the Life lives in and works from, Him. (() This loyos which became flesh, is not from, nor of, Time or Space (ch. iii. 31; viii. 58); but eternally præ-existent, - and manifested in Time and Space, for the gracious ends of divine Love in Redemption (ch. iii. 16, 17). (η) This λόγος spoke in the Law and Prophets, yet partially and imperfectly (ver. 17; ch. v. 39, 46); but in the personal λόγος, spoke forth in fulness of grace and truth. It was He who made the worlds (ver. 3): He. who appeared to Isaiah (Isa. vi., compare ch. xii. 41); He, whose glory is manifested in His power over nature (ch. ii. 11); He, by reception of whom the new birth is wrought (ch. i. 12, 13); who has power over all flesh (ch. xvii. 2),—and can bestow eternal life (ibid.); whose very sufferings were His glory, and the glorifying of God (ch. xvii. 1 al.); and who, after those sufferings, resumed, and now has, the glory which He had with the Father before the world began (ch. xviii. 5, 24).

(θ) Luthardt, in his Commentary on

(θ) Luthardt, in his Commentary on this Gespel, has propounded (vol. i. p. 280 ft.) the following view of the word $\lambda\delta\gamma\sigma$ s and its usage: Jesus Christ is the fulness of that word of God which was fragmentarily manifested in the Prophets (Heb. i. 1). But in this prologue, $\delta\lambda\delta\gamma\sigma$ s is not to be taken as identical with Jesus not yet incarnate, nor is He the subject of vv. 1 ft. And he urges ch. x. 35, 36 (see note there, where I have discussed this) as a key text to the meaning of $\lambda\delta\gamma\sigma$ s. It seems to me, that while much of his view is true and sound, that part of it will not hold which denies the identity of the 1. 33. 69 præ-existent λόγος with Jesus, in the Apostle's mind. Had he intended by the λόγος of vv. 1—4 any other than the personal Son of God who in ver. 14 became flesh, I do not see how ην πρός τον θεόν, and θεδς ην, could be used of δ λύγος. Nor again can I consent with him to disconnect the use of λόγος by St. John from its previous history. The reasons given in this note for believing such use, as matter of fact, to have been prepared by the Alexandrine philosophy, are no way affected by the objections which he alleges, the difference between the Abyos of St. John and that of Philo, and the corrupt character of the philosophy itself. II. (a) We are now secondly to enquire, how it came that St. John found this word hoyos so ready made to his hands, as to require no The answer to this will be explanation. found by tracing the gradual personification of the Word, or Wisdom of God, in the O. T. and Jewish writings. (B) We find faint traces of this personi-

For the whole form and expression of the O. T. revelation was that of the Word of God. The Mosaic history opens with 'God said, Let there be light.' Spoken commands, either openly, or in visions, were the communications from God to man. It is the Word, in all the Prophets; the Word, in the Law; in short, the Word, in all God's dealings with his people: see further, Isa. xl. 8; lv. 10, 11: Jer. xxiii. 29 al.

(γ) And as the Word of God was the constant idea for his revelations relatively to man, so was the Wisdom of God, for those which related to His own essence and attributes. That this was a later form of expression than the simple recognition of the divine Word in the Mosaic and early historical books, would naturally be the case, in the unfolding of spiritual knowledge and divine contemplation. His Almightiness was first felt, before His Wisdom and moral Purity were appreciated. In the books of Job (ch. xxviii. 12 ff.) and the Proverbs (ch. viii., ix.) we find this Wisdom of God personified; in the latter in very plain and striking terms; and this not poetically only, but practically; ascribing to the Wisdom of God all his revelation of Himself in His works of Creation and Providence. So that this Wisdom embraced in fact in itself the Power of God; and there wanted but the highest divine attribute, Love, to complete the idea. But this was reserved for the N. T. mani-(δ) The next evidences of the gradual personification of the Wisdom of God are found in the two Apocryphal Books, the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, and the Wisdom of Solomon, The first of these, originally written in Hebrew (see Winer, Realwörterbuch, s. v.). belongs probably to the latter half of the second century before Christ. In ch. i. 1, Wisdom is said to be παρὰ κυρίου, καλ μετ' αὐτοῦ είς τὸν αίωνα: and in ver. 4, προτέρα πάντων ἔκτισται σοφία. in ch. xxiv. 9-21, the same strain is continued: πρό τοῦ αίωνος ἀπ' ἀρχης έκτισέν με κ.τ.λ., and the passage concludes with these remarkable words, oi έσθίοντές με έτι πεινάσουσιν, καλ οί πίνοντές με έτι διψήσουσιν. In the book of the Wisdom of Solomon, dating probably about 100 A.C., we find (in ch. vi. 22—ch. ix.) a similar personification and eulogy of Wisdom. In this remarkable passage we have Wisdom called πάρεδρος τῶν σῶν θρόνων (ch. ix. 4)—said to have been παρούσα ότε ἐποίεις τον κόσμον (ch. ix. 9)-parallelized with ὁ λόγος σου (ch. ix. 1, 2: see also ch. xvi. 12). In ch. xviii. 15; 16, the παντοδύναμος λόγος is set forth as an Angel coming down from heaven, and destroying the Egyptians.

It seems highly probable that the author's monotheistic views were confused by the admixture of Platonism, and that he regarded Wisdom as a kind of soul of the world. He occasionally puts her for God, occasionally for an attribute of God. But he had not attained that near approach to a personal view which we shall find in the next step of our en-(ε) The large body of Jews resident in Alexandria were celebrated for their gnosis, or religious philosophy. The origin of this philosophy must be referred to the mixture of the Jewish religious element with the speculative philosophies of the Greeks, more especially with that of Plato, and with ideas acquired during the captivity from Oriental sources. One of these Alexandrine writers in the second century A.C. was Aristobulus, some fragments of whose works have been preserved to us. He tells us that by the θεία φωνή we are not to understand a ρητον λόγον, but έργων κατασκευάς—the whole working of God in the creation of the world. But the most complete representation of the Judæo-alexandrine gnosis has come down to us in the works of Philo, who flourished cir. A.D. 40-50. It would be out of the province of a note to give a review of the system of Philo: the result only of such review (see Lücke, vol. i. 272-283) will be enough. He identifies the Abyos with the σοφία of God; it is the εἰκῶν θεοῦ (Mangey, vol. i. p. 6 al. fr.); the ἀρχέτυπος κ. παμάδειγμα φωτός, αὐτὸς δὲ οὐδενὶ τῶν γεγονότων ὅμοιος (i. 632): ὁ πρεσβύτερος τῶν γένεσιν είληφότων (i. 437): πρεσβύτερος υίλς τοῦ των όντων πατρός (i. 414): ὁ πρωτόγονος αὐτοῦ, ὁ ἄγγελος πρεσβύτατος, ὡς ἀρχάγγελος πολυώνυμος υπάρχων (i. 427): σκιὰ θεοῦ, ῷ καθάπερ ὀργάνω χρησάμενος ἐκοσμοποίει (i. 106): δι' οῦ δ κόσμος κατ-εσκευάσθη (i. 162): τῷ δὲ ἀρχαγγέλω κ. πρεσβυτάτω λόγω δωρεάν έξαίρετον έδωκεν ό τὰ ὅλα γεννήσας πατήρ, ἵνα μεθόριος στὰς τὸ γενόμενον διακρίνη τοῦ πεποιη-κότος.—ἀγάλλεται δὲ ἐπὶ τῆ δωρεᾳ, ούτε αγέννητος ώς δ θεδς ών, οὐδε γεννητὸς ὡς ὑμεῖς, ἀλλὰ μέσος τῶν ἄκρων, ἀμφοτέροις ὁμηρεύων (i. 501 f.): δύο γάρ, ώς ξοικεν, ίερα θεοῦ, εν μεν όδε δ κόσμος, έν & καὶ ἀρχιερεὺς ὁ πρωτόγονος αὐτοῦ θείος λόγος (i. 653): ὁ τοῦ θεοῦ ὕπαρχος (i. 308): περιέχει πάντα καλ πεπλήρωκεν (ii. 655): δεύτερος θεός, ός έστιν εκείνου λόγος (ii. 625, fragment, from Eusebius. Prap. Evang. vii. 13, vol. iii. p. 545). These instances, the number of which might be much enlarged, will serve to shew how remarkably near to the diction and import of some passages in our Gospel Philo approached in speaking of the Abyos.

At the same time there is a wide and unmistakeable difference between his λόγος and that of the Apostle. He does not distinguish it from the Spirit of God (Lücke, i. p. 278), nor does he connect it with any Messianic ideas, though these latter were familiar to him. Besides, his views are strangely compounded of Platonism and Judaism. The Abyos seems to be one comprehending, or ruling, the δυνάμεις or ίδεαι of God, which, although borrowed from Plato, he judaically calls άγγελοι, and the λόγος their ἀρχάγγελος. We see by this however how fixed and prepared the term, and many of its attributes, were in the religious philosophy of the Alexandrine Jews. (On the question whether the Adyos of Philo is to be taken as strictly personal, see Dorner's remarks on Lücke, in his Lehre von der Person Christi, i. p. 22 note.) (() Meanwhile the Chaldee paraphrasts of the O. T. had habitually used such expressions as אָקרא, or מִימָרָא, or מֵימָרָא, 'the glory,' or 'the presence,' or 'the word,' of God,-in places where nothing but His own agency could be understood. The last of these -the Memra, or word of God,-is used in so strictly personal a sense, that there can be little doubt that the Paraphrasts understood by it a divine Person or (η) From these elements. Emanation. the Alexandrine and Jewish views of the λόγος or σοφία of God, there appear to have arisen very early among Christians, both orthodox and heretic, formal expressions, in which these or equivalent terms were used. Of this the Apostle Paul furnishes the most eminent example. His teacher Gamaliel united in his instruction both these elements, and they are very perceptible in the writings of his pupil. But we do not find in them any direct use of the term dóyos, as personally applied to the Son of God. This shews him to have spoken mainly according to the Jewish school,-among whom, as Origen states, he could find none who held to tou λόγον είναι τον υίον τοῦ θεοῦ (Cont. Cels. ii. 31, vol. i. p. 413). (θ) We find a much nearer approximation to the Alexandrine method of speech in the Epistle to the Hebrews, written evidently by some disciple intimately acquainted with the Alexandrine gnosis (see the opening verses, and especially φέρων τὰ πάντα τῷ δήματι τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ). But even there we have not the hoyos identified personally with the Lord Jesus Christ, nor indeed personally spoken of at all,-however near some passages may seem to approach to this usage (ch. iv. 12, 13; xi. 3). The Alexandrine gnosis was immediately connected with Ephesus, where the Gospel of John was probably written. Apollos (Acts xviii. 24) came thither from Alexandria; and Cerinthus is related by Theodoret (Fab. Hær. ii. 3, vol. iv. p. 389) to have studied and formed his philosophic system in Egypt, before coming to Ephe-

(k) These notices will serve to acsus. count for the term loyos being already found by St. John framed to his use; and the anti-Gnostic tendency of his writings will furnish an additional reason why he should rescue such important truths as the præ-existence and attributes of the divine $\lambda \delta \gamma \sigma s$ from the perversions which false philosophy had begun to make of (A) In all that has been said in this note, no insinuation has been conveyed that either the Apostle Paul, or the writer to the Hebrews, or John, adopted in any degree their TEACHING from the existing philosophies. Their teaching (which is totally distinct from any of those philosophies, as will be shewn in this commentary) is that of the Holy Spirit;—and the existing philosophies, with all their follies and inadequacies, must be regarded, in so far as they by their terms or ideas subserved the work which the Spirit had to do by the Apostles and teachers of Christianity, as so many providential preparations of the minds of men to receive the fuller effulgence of the Truth as it is in Jesus, which shines forth in these Scriptures.

The substance of this note has been derived from Dr. Lücke's Commentary, vol. i. p. 249—294: De Wette's Handbuch, on John i. 1: Dorner, Lehre von der Person Christi, i. p. 15 fl.: Olshausen, Comm. ii. p. 30 ff.

1.] $\hat{\epsilon}v$ $\hat{a}\rho\chi\hat{\eta} = \pi\rho\delta \ \tau o\hat{v} \ \tau \delta v \ \kappa \delta \sigma \mu ov \ \epsilon \hat{l}v\alpha l$, ch. xvii. 5. The expression is indefinite, and must be interpreted relatively to the matter spoken of. Thus in Acts xi. 15, it is 'the beginning of the Gospel:' and by the same principle of interpretation, here it is the beginning of all things, on account of the $\pi dv \tau a \ \delta l' \ av \tau$. $\hat{\epsilon}\gamma$. ver. 3.

These words, if they do not assert, at least imply, the eternal præ-existence of the Divine Word. For $\tilde{\epsilon}\nu$ $\tilde{\alpha}\rho\chi\tilde{\eta}$ is not said of an act done $\hat{\epsilon}\nu$ $\tilde{\alpha}\rho\chi\tilde{\eta}$ (as in Gen. i. 1), but of a state existing $\hat{\epsilon}\nu$ $\hat{\alpha}\rho\chi\tilde{\eta}$, and therefore without beginning itself.

τοῦ θεοῦ λόγου τὸ ἔστιν εἰπεῖν ἀλλ' ἐπεὶ πρός διαφοράν της ένανθρωπήσεως γενομένης έν τινι καιρώ, άντι του έστιν τώ ην δ εὐαγγελιστής κέχρηται (in Catena, Lücke, p. 296). The existence of an enduring and unlimited state of being, implied in fiv, is contrasted with exevero in ver. 3, and especially in ver. 14. δ λ. $\mathring{\eta}\nu$ πρὸς τ. θ.] The usage of πρός here, as with (i. e. Basil remarks (Lücke, i. 297) that John says πρός τον θ., not ἐν τῷ θ., Ίνα τὸ ἰδιάζον τῆς ύποστάσεως παραστήση, ίνα μή πρόφασιν δῷ τῆ συγχύσει τῆς ὑποστάσεως. Both the inner substantial union, and the distinct personality of the Abyos are here The former is distinctly reasserted. peated in the next words. κ. θ. ήν o λ.] and the Word was God. As regards the form of the sentence, it is strictly parallel with πνεθμα δ θεός, ch. iv. 24. But the sense to be conveyed here is as weighty a consideration as the form of the sentence. Had John intended to say, ' God was the Word,'-what meaning could his assertion possibly have conveyed? None other than a contradiction to his last assertion, by which he had distinguished God from the Word. And not only would this be the case, but the assertion would be inconsistent with the whole historical idea of the λόγος, making this term to signify merely an attribute of God, just as when it is said & beds ἀγάπη ἐστίν. Not to mention the unprecedented inversion of subject and predicate which this would occasion; & Adyos having been the subject before, and again resumed as the subject afterwards.

The rendering of the words being then as above, their meaning is the next question. The omission of the article before $\theta \epsilon \delta s$ is not mere usage; it could not have been here expressed, whatever place the words might hold in the sentence. δ λόγος ην δ $\theta \epsilon \delta s$ would give a sense liable to the objections first stated, and destroy the idea of the λόγος altogether. θεός must then be taken as implying God, in substance and essence,—not δ be δs , 'the Father,' in Person. It does not = $\theta \epsilon \hat{\delta} s$, nor is it to be rendered a God-but, as in σάρξ ἐγένετο, σάρξ expresses that state into which the Divine Word entered by a definite act, so in θεὸς ην, θεός expresses that essence which was His èν ἀρχη:-

that He was very God. So that this first verse might be connected thus: the Logos was from eternity,—was with God (the Father),—and was Himself God.

2.] In order to direct the mind to the difference (in unity) between this $\lambda\delta\gamma\sigma$ s and δ $\theta\epsilon\delta$ s, John recalls the reader's attention to the two first clauses of ver. 1, which he now combines, in order to pass on to the creative work, which distinctly belongs to the $\lambda\delta\gamma\sigma$ s. Thus also this verse fixes the reference of $a\dot{v}\tau\sigma\ddot{v}$ in ver. 3, which might otherwise, after the mention of $\theta\epsilon\delta$ s, have seemed ambiguous.

3.] πάντα = τὰ Πάντα (1 Cor. viii. 6: Col. i. 16), $= \delta \kappa \delta \sigma \mu \sigma s$, ver. 10. This parallelism of itself refutes the Socinian interpretation of πάντα, 'all Christian graces and virtues,' 'the whole moral world.' But the history of the term λόγος forbids such an explanation entirely. For Philo (i. 162) says εὐρήσεις αίτιον μεν αὐτοῦ (τοῦ κόσμου) τὸν θεόν, ύφ' οὖ γέγονεν ύλην δέ, τὰ τέσσαρα στοιχεῖα, εξ ὧν συνεκράθη· ὅργανον δέ, λόγον θεοῦ, δι' οῦ κατεσκευάσθη: see also Col. i. 16, and Heb. i. 2. Olshausen observes, that we never read in Scripture that 'Christ made the world;' but 'the Father made the world did the Son.' or 'the world was made ὑπό the Father, and did the Son:' because the Son never works of Himself, but always as the revelation of the Father; His work is the Father's will, and the Father has no Will, except the Son, who is all His will (ἐν ῷ εὐδόκησεν). The Christian Fathers rightly therefore rejected the semi-Arian formula, 'The Son was begotten by an act of the Father's will;' for He is that Will καὶ χωρ. αὐτ.] This addition is not merely a Hebraistic parallelism, but a distinct denial of the eternity and uncreatedness of matter as held by the Gnostics. They set matter, as a separate existence, over against God, and made it the origin of evil:—but John excludes any such notion. Nothing was made without Him (the λόγος); all matter, and implicitly evil itself, in the deep and inscrutable purposes of creation (for it οὐκ ἦν ἐν τῷ ἀρχῷ ἀλλὰ γέγονεν), δι' αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο. The punctuation at the end of the verse is uncertain, if we regard solely manuscript authority, but rests on the sense of the passage, which is rendered weak, and inconsistent with analogy, weak, because in that case we must render 'That which was made by Him was life (i. c. having life), and that life was the light of men;' but how was that life, i.e. that living creation which was made by Him, the light of men?—inconsistent with grammatical analogy, for John never uses γενέσθαι έν for 'to be made by.' But Cyr-Alex., who adopts this punctuation, renders the passage thus: 'that which was made, therein was life.'] Besides which, John's usage of beginning a sentence with ev and a demonstrative pron. should have its weight: cf. ch. xiii. 35; xv. 8; xvi. 26: 1 John ii. 3, 4, 5; iii. (8,) 10, 16, 19, 24; iv. 2 al. fr. Compare also έν τούτω ή αλήθεια οὐκ ἔστιν, 1 John ii. 4.— αμαρτία εν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστιν, ib. iii. 5. I have determined therefore for the ordinary punctuation. It is said to have been first adopted owing to an abuse of the passage by the Macedonian heretics, who maintained that if the exclusion was complete, the Holy Spirit can also not have been without His creating power, i. e. was created by Him. But this would be refuted without including & yéyovev, for the Holy Spirit ην, not ἐγένετο. 4. ἐν αὐτῷ ζωὴ ἦν] Compare 1 John v. 11;

i. 1, 2, and ch. vi. 33. ζωή is not merely 'spiritual life,' nor 'the recovery of blessedness,'—as Tholuck, Kuinoel, &c. explain it:-the λόγος is the source of all life to the creature, not indeed ultimately, but mediately (see ch. v. 26: 1 John κ. ή ζωή ήν τ. φως τ. άνθ] This is not to be understood of the teaching of the Incarnate Logos, but of the enlightening and life-sustaining influence of the eternal Son of God, in Whom was life. In the material world, light, the offspring of the Word of God, is the condition of life, and without it life degenerates and expires:-so also in the spiritual world that life which is in Him, is to the creature the very condition of all development and furtherance of the life of the spirit. All knowledge, all purity, all love, all happiness, spring up and grow from this life, which is the light to them It is not φωs, but το φωs:-

because this is the only true light: see ver. 9, also 1 John i. 5. 5.] As light and life are closely connected ideas, so are death and darkness. The whole world, lying in death and in darkness, is the σκοτία here spoken of:--not merely the ἐσκοτωμένοι (Eph. iv. 18; see ib. v. 7, 8), but the whole mass, with the sole exception (see below, ver. 12) of ὅσοι ἔλαβον αὐτόν (compare ch. iii. 19: 1 John v. 19).

This pairer is not merely the historical present, but describes the whole process of the light of life in the Eternal Word shining in this evil and dark world; both by the O. T. revelations, and (see ch. x. 16; xi. 52) by all the scattered fragments of light glittering among the thick darkness of heathendom. κατέλ. and the darkness comprehended (understood, apprehended) it not. That this is the meaning, will be clear from the context. John states here as a general fact, what he afterwards states of the appearance of the Incarnate Word to the chosen people, ver. 11. The sentences are strictly parallel. τδ φ. ἐν τῆ σκ. φαίνει || είς τὰ ἴδια ἦλθεν, and κ. ή σκ. αὐτὸ οὐ κατέλ. | και οι ίδιοι αὐτὸν οὐ παρέλαβον. In the first, he is speaking of the whole shining of this light over the world; in the second, of its historical manifestation to the Jews. In both cases, the Divine Word was rejected. παρέλαβον is used in the second case as expressing the personal assumption to oneself as a friend or companion; see reff. observes (i. 313), that the almost tragic tone of this verse is prevalent through the Gospel of John and his First Epistle, see ch. iii. 19; xii. 37 ff. al.: and is occasionally found in Paul also, see Rom. The other interpretation of κατέλαβεν, 'overtook,' 'came upon' (for that of 'overcame' (Orig., Theophyl., Euthym.) is not admissible, the word never importing this), is unobjectionable as far as the usage of the word is concerned (see ch. xii. 35: Mark ix. 18); but yields no sense in the context. The connexion of the two members of our verse by καί is not, 'The Light shineth in the darkness, and therefore (i. e. because darkness is the opposition to light, and they exclude one another) the dark-ness comprehended it not; but, 'The Light shineth in the darkness, and yet (notwithstanding that the effect of light in darkness is so great and immediate in the physical world) the darkness comprehended it not: see καί below, ver. 11.

6-18.7 THE MANIFESTATION AND WORKING OF THE DIVINE WORD, JESUS CHRIST, THE SON OF GOD, INCARNATE IN OUR FLESH. 6.7 The Evangelist now passes to the historic manifestation of the Word. μετεληλυθώς ἐπὶ τὴν ἐπιφάνειαν τοῦ υίοῦ, τίνα αν εύρεν ἀρχὴν έτέραν, ή τὰ κατὰ τὸν Ἰωάννην; (Theodor. Mopsuest. in loc. p. 729, ed. Migne.) He enunciates briefly in these verses 6, 7, what he afterwards, vv. 19-36, narrates with historical detail. έγένετο - not belonging to ἀπεσταλμένος, but to ἄνθρ. : the ordinary opening of an historical period, see Luke i. 5. No stress on ἐγένετο, as distinguished from nv, ver. 1 (Olshausen), see ch. iii. 1. There was-a man sent, In ἀπεστ. παρὰ θεοῦ we have possibly a reference to Mal. iii. 1.

7.7 The purpose of John's coming was to bear witness to a fact, which fact (ver. 33) was made known to him by divine revelation. εἰς μαρτυρίαν, not as Ε. V., for a witness,' but for witness, for the purpose of bearing witness: so A. V. R.

ίνα μαρτ. κ.τ.λ. is an expansion of eis mapr.: - the subject of his testimony was to be the Light, -and the aim of it, that all might believe (είς τὸ φῶς, see ch. xii. 36) through him (i. e. John: not τοῦ φωτός (Grot.), which confuses the whole, for then we must understand eis $\theta \epsilon \delta v$ after $\pi \iota \sigma \tau$. which is here out of place).

8.] John was himself ὁ λύχνος ὁ καιόμενος και φαίνων (ch. v. 35), see note on Matt. v. 14, but not to dos. iva, see reff.: it belongs to ηv , not to $\tilde{\eta} \lambda \theta \epsilon v$ above. And thus there is no ellipsis of 'came' or 'was sent:' John simply was, 9. The word alybein order to &c. νόν (see reff.) in this connexion imports original, 'archetypal,' and is used of the true genuine sources and patterns of those things which we find here below only in fragmentary imitations and derivations. Such an original was the Light here spoken of ;-but John was only a derived light,not lumen illuminans, but lumen illumina-The construction of this verse has been much disputed. Is ἐρχόμενον εἰς τ.κ. to be taken with ανθρωπον (as latt syrr copt Orig Eus₂ Epiph Chr Cyr Thl Euthym and most of the ancient Commentators and E. V.), or does it belong to to The former construcφῶς τὸ ἀλ. ? tion can only be defended by a Rabbinical usage, by which בָל בָּאֵי עוֹלָם means 'all men' (Schöttgen, i. 223). But it is very questionable whether John ever speaks thus. Certainly he does not, in any of the passages commonly cited to defend this rendering, ch. xviii. 37 (which is spoken by Christ of Himself and His Mission); xvi. 21, 28; xii. 46. And even if he had thus spoken, how harsh and how unmeaning is the sentence; whether with Euthym. we lay an emphasis on $\hat{\eta}\nu$, or with E. V. &c. supply $\tau o \hat{v} \tau o$ before it. If this latter had been intended, surely it would have been more distinctly expressed; and even when it is supplied, we have in this verse only a less forcible repetition of ver. 4. It seems then that we must join έρχ. εἰς τ. κ. with τ. φῶς τ. ἀληθ. even then, three ways of rendering are The first of apparently open to us. these, which is that of Socinus, takes έρχόμ. κ.τ.λ. as meaning, 'at its coming into the world.' This however-besides the sense being inconsistent with ver. 4 leaves the opening clause without a demonstrative pronoun, as before. Then, secondly, ἐρχόμενον might seem to be used in the sense in which we frequently have ἐρχόμενος, as a quasi-future, 'who was, or is, to come:' see Matt. xi. 3: Mark x. 30 al. fr.: ch. vi. 14; xi. 27, in which last two places it is joined, as the world, or of ideas mankind in general: it would be difficult to point out any Scripture usage to justify such a meaning. But abundance of passages bear out the meaning which makes Tà idia His own inheritance or possession, i. e. Judæa; and of ideot, the Jews: compare especially the parable Matt. xxi. 33 ff., and Sir. xxiv. 7 ff. And thus ħλθεν forms a nearer step in the approach to the declaration in ver. 14. He came to His own. Οη παρέλ. see reff.,-and above on ver. 5.

And this birth is owing to the Holy Spirit of God; so that this is equivalent to saying, 'As many as received Him, to them gave He His Holy Spirit.' And we find that it was so: see Acts x. 44. τέκνα θ. is a more comprehensive expression than viol τ . θ ., which brings out rather our adoption, and hope of inheritance (Rom. viii. 14 ff.), whereas the other involves the whole generation and process of our life in the Spirit, as being from and of God, and consequently our likeness to God, walking in light as He is in light (1 John i. 5-7)-free from sin (ib. iii. 9; v. 18) and death (ch. viii. τοις πιστ. είς τ. όν. αὐτ. τὸ ονομα αυτ. is His manifestation as that which He has given Himself out to be, i. c. as a Saviour from sin: see Matt. i. 21, καλέσεις τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦν αὐτὸς γὰρ σώσει τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τῶν 13.7 The Jews άμαρτιῶν αὐτῶν. grounded their claim to be children of God on their descent from Abraham. children of God by faith. It is to be noticed that the conjunctions here are not the merely disjunctive ones οὕτε...οὕτε, which would necessitate the ranging the clauses as co-ordinate and parallel, but ούδε ... ούδε, which rise in climax from one clause to another,—'not έξ αίμάτων, nor yet έκ θελ. σαρκ. nor yet έκ θελ. άνδ., but ἐκ θεοῦ ' (see examples of οὕτε, Matt. xii. 32: of οὐδέ, Matt. vi. 26). Many interpreters have seen in θέλημα ἀνδρός the male, and in θέλημα σαρκός the female side of human concupiscence (so Augustine, Theophylact, &c.); or in the former the higher and more conscious, in the latter the lower and animal side (Bleek, Luthardt). Besides the above, other objections lie against both these interpretations,—(1) that $\sigma \alpha \rho \xi$ is never so used (Eph. v. 29 is no instance in point); (2) that θέλημα is ascribed to both. Euthymius seems to give the right interpretation: εἰπὼν δὲ ὅτι οὐκ ἐξ αίμάτων, έπήγαγε φανερώτερον ότι οὐδὲ ἐκ θελήματος σαρκός είτα και τοῦτο τελεώτερον έφηρμήνευσε, προςθείς ότι οὐκ ἐκ θελήματος ἀνδρός αίμα γὰρ καὶ σάρξ, ὁ ἀνήρ θέλημα δὲ νῦν νοε: τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν, τὴν συνουσίαν: in loc. ii. 421. Or perhaps this may be carried somewhat further, and we may better satisfy the climax by regarding the ἐξ αἰμάτων as indicating the mere phenomena of physical generation wherever found: then rising to εκ θελήματος σαρκός, the instigation of that capacity by sexual desire: then rising still higher to the most exalted instance of that desire, ἐκ θελήματος ανδρός. The plural usage of αίμάτων is only found in one other place in this signification,-Eurip. Ion 693 Dind., 705 Herm., έχει δόλον τύχαν θ' δ παῖς | ἄλλων τραφείς ἀφ' αἰμάτων. The other usage of the plural, for murder, is frequent in the LXX and the classics.

ἀνήρ, in the sense of man generally, is not uncommon; we have in plur. πατηρ ἀνδρῶν τε θεῶν τε, in Hom. passim; and in sing. Il. ν. 321; σ. 432,

He became that, of which man is in the body compounded. There is no reference here to the doctrine of the Lord Jesus being the second Adam, as Olshausen thinks; but although there may be no reference to it, it lies at the ground of this wideness of expression. The doctrine in this form may have been, as Lücke observes, alien to John's habits of thought, but not that which is implied in the doctrine, the taking of the nature of man by the Eternal Word. The simplicity of this expression is no doubt directed against the Docetæ of the Apostle's time, who maintained that the Word only apparently took human nature. Therefore he says σὰρξ ἐγένετο, absolutely and literally became flesh: see ref. 1 John. The expression is not guarded against the interpretation of the Apollinarian heretics, who held that the Lord had not a human soul $(\psi \nu \chi \dot{\eta})$; but this error was not in the Apostle's view, and is abundantly refuted elsewhere (see Matt. xxvi. 38 and note on 36-46, and the references there made to John's Gospel). ἐσκήνωσεν, 'so-journed,' or 'tabernacled,' in us. There is no reference to the flesh being the tabernacle of the Spirit; -but the word is one technically used in Scripture to import the dwelling of God among men. In the N. T. usage it signifies the only son ;-in the LXX, Ps. xxi. 20, the beloved, and Ps. xxiv. 16, one deserted, left alone. It has been attempted to render the word in John, according to the usage in Ps. xxi. 20. But obviously in the midst of ideas reaching so far deeper than that of regard, or love, of the Father for the Son, the word cannot be interpreted except in accordance with them. It refers to, and contrasts with, the $\tau \in \kappa \nu \alpha$ $\tau \circ \hat{\nu}$ $\theta \in \hat{\nu}$ in vv. 12, 13. receive their divine birth by faith in Him and through Him; but HE is the movoγενής of the Father in the higher sense, in which He is γεννηθείς the Son of God.

παρὰ πατρός belongs to μονογενοῦς; not to δόξαν, as Theophyl., Erasm., Grot. suppose. The ellipse is to be supplied by considering the state in which the $\lambda \delta \gamma \sigma$ here appears,—that of having become $\sigma \delta \rho \xi$ and dwelling among us.

πλήρ, χάρ, κ. άλ.] These words have been variously connected. The view of Erasmus, who places the period at $\pi \alpha \tau \rho \delta r$, and connects these words with 1 ωάννης, scarcely needs refutation, whether we regard the construction, or the meaning of the sentence. The reading $\pi \lambda \dot{\eta} \rho \eta$ has probably arisen from a correction, to connect the adj. with $\delta \delta \xi a \nu$. Some do this even with $\pi\lambda\dot{\eta}\rho\eta s$, but both the construction and the sense are against it. It was not the δόξα, but He Himself, that was $\pi\lambda$ ήρης χ. κ. άλ.: see below, ver. 17. Others suppose $\pi\lambda\dot{\eta}\rho\eta s$ to refer directly to μονογενούς, and justify this by Eph. iii. 17, 18. But besides the unnecessary harshness of this, the sense is against it also; for it cannot be said, 'we saw His glory, the glory as of one who was full of grace and truth;' we must have the &s referring, in the sense of olav empene (see above), to some mysterious hidden character which the glory testified, whereas the πλήρης χ. κ. αλ. is itself a mere matter of fact, to which the Apostles themselves could (ver. 17) bear witness. Another construction is (as usually done and in E. V.) to take καl πατρός as parenthetical, and connect πλήρης immediately with ἐσκήνωσεν. Such parentheses are common in the style of this Gospel: see ch. vi. 22-24; xi. 2; xix. 23, 24; ib. ver. 31. But by far the best is, to regard πλήρης as referring to αὐτοῦ, by an anomaly in concord often found in the N.T. (see Luke xx. 27 note; xxiv. 47), and especially in the Apocalypse,—cf. Rev. i. 4 al. fr. κ. άλ. Not = χάριτος ἀληθινῆς, which destroys the precision of the expression, and itself conveys no sense whatever; but setting out the two sides of the divine manifestation in Christ, -χάρις, as the result of Love to mankind, - άλήθεια (see reff. and ch. xiv. 6), as the unity, purity, and light of His own Character. The testimony of John, so important as being the fulfilment of the very object for which he was ἀπεσταλμένος παρά θεοῦ, is in this prologue ranged, so to speak, parallel with the assertions and testimony of the Evangelist himself. So that this verse does not interrupt the train of thought, but confirms by this important testimony the assertion δ $\lambda \delta \gamma os$ $\sigma \grave{\alpha} \rho \xi \ \grave{\epsilon} \gamma$., shewing that John bore witness to His præ-existence. Then (ver. 16) the $\pi\lambda\eta\rho$, χ , κ , $\dot{\alpha}\lambda$, is again taken up. Euthymius paraphrases: el kal μη έγώ, φησί, δοκῶ τισιν ίσως άξιόπιστος, άλλα προ έμου ο Ἰωάννης μαρτυρεί περί της θεότητος αὐτοῦ, Ἰωάννης ἐκεῖνος, οῦ τὸ ὄνομα μέγα καὶ περιβόητον παρὰ πᾶσι τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις. μαρτυρεί, present, for solemnity—as part of the testimony to 15. om $\text{legaw} \ D \ \aleph^1(\text{ins} \ \aleph\text{-corr}^1) \ \text{lat-}b.$ of $\text{eip} \ \text{B}^1\text{C}^1 \ \aleph\text{-corr}^1 \ \text{Orig}[-\text{Huet}]: ov }$ of $\text{eip} \ \text{lat} \ \text{eip} \ \text{lat} \ \text{eip} \ \text{lat} \ \text{lat} \ \text{eip} \ \text{lat} \ \text{lat} \ \text{eip} \ \text{ei$

Then, on doing so, he exclaimed, This was He of whom I said, &c. This view seems to be borne out by his own statement, ver. 33, and by the order of the varrative in Matt. iii. 11, 12, 13. οπίσω μ. έρχ. In point of time; not of birth merely or principally, nor of commencement of official life: but, inasmuch as John was His Forerunner, on account of official position.

έμπροσθέν μ. γέγονεν The E. V. is here very accurate,-is preferred before me; the yéyovev setting forth the advancement to official dignity before which John's office waned and decreased (ch. iii. 30), which took place even while John's course was being fulfilled. The only objection to 'preferred' is, its possible ambiguity. Even Dr. Johnson has fallen into the mistake, in his Dictionary, of quoting this passage as an instance of the sense "to love more than another." [Taketh place,'] 'is advanced,' 'hath come to be' (which however again is ambiguous), are other possible renderings. This sense of ϵμπροσθεν (besides reff.) is justified by classical usage in Plato, who uses $\xi \mu \pi \rho o \sigma \theta \epsilon \nu$ τιθέναι for præponere, Legg. vii. 805. See also i. 631; v. 743. Also Demosthenes, κατὰ Διονυσοδώρου, p. 1296. 26, τὰς airías των ήδικηκότων ξμπροσθεν ούσας του δικαίου. ὅτι πρωτός μου ἦν] The only sense which these words will bear, is, because (or, for, but better because) He was (not ἐγένετο, but ἦν as in ver. 1) before Me; i. e. 'He existed, was in being, before me.' The question raised by Lücke and De Wette, whether it is probable that the Baptist had, or expressed such views of the præ-existence of Christ, is not one for us to deal with, in the face of so direct a testimony as is given to the fact, here and in ch. iii. 27 ff. In all probability, the Evangelist was himself a disciple of the Baptist: and if he has given us a fuller and somewhat differing account of his testimony to Christ, it is because his means of information were ampler than those of the other Evangelists. The questioners seem to forget that the Baptist was divinely raised up and commissioned, and full of the Holy Ghost, and spoke in that power: his declarations were not therefore merely conclusions which he had arrived at by natural means,—the study of the prophecies, &c. (Lücke, p. 353): but inspirations and revelations of the Spirit. This last is fully recognized by Olshausen (ii. 61). 16.] Origen (in Evang. Johan. tom. vi. 2, vol. iv. p. 102) blames Heracleon for terminating the testimony of John at the end of ver. 17, and makes it continue to the end of ver. 18. But it can hardly be that his testimony extends beyond ver. 15, for ημείς πάντες would bear no very definite meaning, and the assertions in ver. 17 would be alien from the character of the Baptist, belonging as they do to the more mature development of Christian doctrines. I cannot doubt that this and the following verses belong to the Evangelist, and are a carrying onwards of his declarations concerning the divine Ver. 15 is not parenthetical, but confirmatory of ver. 14, and this verse grounds itself on the fact of ver. 14, corroborated by the testimony of ver. 15,that He dwelt among us, and that we saw His glory, full of grace and truth. τὸ πλήρωμα is that of which He was

and that 'our relation to Him has been that of recipients out of His fulness, and the thing received has been' So Herod. i. 102, έχων δύο ταθτα έθνεα, καὶ ἀμφότερα ἰσχυρά. άντὶ χάριτος The ancient interpretation, την καινην διαθήκην άντι της παλαιας (Euthym.), is certainly wrong, for the ἐλάβομεν is spoken entirely of the times of the Incarnate Word: and besides, δ νόμος and χάρις are distinctly opposed to one another in the next verse. The prep. avti is properly used of any thing which supersedes another, or occupies its place. This is in fact its ordinary usage when exchange is spoken of: the possession of the thing gotten succeeds to, supersedes, the possession of the thing given in exchange, and I possess τοῦτο ἀντὶ ἐκείνου. Thus also we have received χάριν ἀντὶ χάριτος, continual accessions of grace; new grace coming upon and superseding the former. Thus in Theognis, Sentt. 343 ff. (Lücke), τεθναίην δ' εἰ μή τι κακῶν ἄμπαυμα μεριμνέων | εὐροίμην, δοίης δ' ἀντ' ἀνιῶν åνίας. And Chrysostom, de Sacerdotio, 6. 13, vol. i. p. 435, σὺ δέ με ἐκπέμπεις, έτέραν ανθ' έτέρας φροντίδα ένθείς. Also Philo, i. 254, speaking of this very word τέρων, καὶ ὰεὶ νέας ἀντὶ παλαιοτέρων, τότε μὲν διαφορούσας, τότε δ' αὖ καὶ τὰς αὐτὰς ἐπιδίδωσι. 17.] The connexion of this verse with the foregoing lies in the words τοῦ πληρώμ. αὐτοῦ (ver. 16), and in χάρις κ. ἀλ. (ver. 14). 'We received from His fulness continual additions of grace, because that fulness is not, like the law, a positive enactment, finite and circumscribed, of which it could be said that it ἐδόθη, but the bringing in of grace and truth, which eyéveto by Jesus Christ.' ἐδόθη and ἐγένετο have been variously distinguished, -αὐθεντικόν μέν τὸ ἐγένετο, δυυλικόν δὲ τὸ ἐδόθη, Theophyl. Similarly Bengel, "Mosis non sua est lex; Christi sua est gratia et veritas." Clem. Alex. Pæd. i. 7, p. 134 P, says: διδ καί φησιν ή γραφή "δ νόμος δια Μωυσέως έδόθη," οὐχὶ ὑπὸ Μωυσέως, ἀλλὰ ὑπὸ μέν τοῦ λόγου, διὰ Μωυσέως δὲ τοῦ θεράποντος αὐτοῦ. διὸ καὶ πρόςκαιρος ἐγίνετο, ή δὲ ἀίδιος χάρις καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ ἐγένετο, κ.τ.λ. Origen (in Joan. tom. vi. c. 3, vol. iv .p. 107) speaks very similarly. But the distinction laid down above, which is hinted at by De Wette, seems to me to be the most obvious, and best suited to the context. where the πλήρωμα of Christ is set against the narrowness of positive enactment in the law. Certainly, the distinction must not be lost sight of, nor denied, as Lücke attempts to do: for Bengel truly observes: "Nullus philosophus tam accurate verba ponit, differentiamque eorum observat, quam Johannes, in hoc præsertim χάρις κ. άλ.] I must again capite." caution the student against any such wholly inadequate explanations as that these words are put 'per hendiadyn' for χάρις ἀληθινή. It is in this way that the depths of Scripture have been covered over by the rubbish of expositors. Such was not the method of investigation pursued by the great men of former centuries: witness Origen in loc. : εὶ γὰρ Ἰησοῦς ἐστιν ὁ φάσκων " έγώ εἰμι ἡ ἀλήθεια," πῶς ἡ ἀλήθεια διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ γίνεται; αὐτὸς γάρ τις δι' έαυτοῦ οὐ γίνεται. ἀλλὰ νοητέον ὅτι ἡ αὐτοαλήθεια ή οὐσιώδης καὶ Ίν' οὕτως εἴπω πρωτότυπος της έν ταις λογικαις ψυχαις άληθείας οὐχὶ διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ ἐγένετο, οὐδ' ὅλως διά τινος, ἀλλ' ὑπὸ θεοῦ ἐγένετο ώς καὶ ὁ λόγος οὐ διά τινος, ὁ ἐν ἀρχῆ πρὸς τὸν θεόν, καὶ ἡ σοφία, ἡν ἔκτισεν ἀρχὴν όδων αὐτοῦ ὁ θεός, οὐ διά τινος, οὕτως οὐδὲ ή ἀλήθεια διά τινος. ή δὲ παρ' ἀνθρώποις άλήθεια διά Ίησοῦ χριστοῦ ἐγένετο οἶον ή ἐν Παύλω ἀλ. καὶ τοῖς ἀποστόλοις διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ ἐγένετο (vol. iv. p. 107).

18.] The connexion is: 'Moses could not give out of the πλήρωμα of grace and truth, for he had no immediate sight of God, and no man can have: there is but One who can ἐξηγεῖσθαι θεόν, the μονογενὴς νίος, who is no mere man, but abides in the bosom of the Father.'

θεὸν οὐδ. ἐώρ. π.] The sight of God here meant, is not only bodily sight (though of that it is true, see Exod. xxxiii. 20: 1 Tim. vi. 16), but intuitive and infallible knowledge, which enables Him who has it to declare the nature and will of God: see ch. iii. 11; vi. 46; xiv. 7. TERTULLIAN wrote against Praxeas (cap xv. vol ii. pp. 172 ff. ed Migne) as follows: Ecce enim et in Evangeliis et in Apostolis visibilem et invisibilem deum deprehendo; sub manifesta et personali distinctione conditionis utriusque. Exclamat quodammodo Johannes: "Deum nemo vidit unquam," utique nec retro. Ademit enim temporis quæstionem, dicendo deum nunquam visum. Confirmat et Apostolus de deo: "Quem nemo vidit hominum sed nec videre potest," scilicet quia morietur, qui videbit..... Et ideo quoniam sermonem dei deum dixerat (John i. 1) ne (al ut) adjuvaret adversariorum præsumptionem quasi patrem ipsum vidisset, ad distinguendum inter invisibilem patrem et filium visibilem, superdicit ex abundanti: "Deum nemo vidit unquam." Quem deum : sermonem? Atquin "vidimus et audivimus et contrectavimus de sermone vitæ" prædictum est. Sed quem deum? scilicet patrem apud quem deum erat sermo, "unigenitus (scilicet) filius qui in sinum (al est in sinu) patris ipse disseruit." Filius ergo visus est semper, et filius conversatus est semper, et filius operatus est semper, ex auctoritate patris et voluntate : quia "filius nihil a semetipso potest facere, nisi viderit patrem facientem;" in sensu scilicet facientem. Pater enim (in) sensu agit. Filius vero, quod in patris sinu est videns perficit. Pater enim (in) sensu agit. Fittus vero, quod in patris Sie "omnia per filium facta sunt et sine illo factum est nihil." There cannot there Equally clear is the fore be the smallest doubt that Tertullian really read filius. evidence of Hippolytus: δρών δέ τον θεον οὐδ' είς εί μη μόνος ὁ παῖς, καὶ τέλειος άνθρωπος, και μόνος διηγησάμενος την βουλήν τοῦ πατρός. λέγει γαρ και Ἰωάννης "Θεδν οὐδεὶς εωρακεν πώποτε μονογενής υίδς, δ ων είς τον κόλπον τοῦ πατρός, αὐτός "Θεδυ ουδείς έωρακεν πωποτε' μονογενης νιος, ο ων εις τον κολπον του πατρος, αυτος διηγήσατο." (Cont. Hær. Noeti, c. v. p. 812, Migne, Patrol. vol x.) On the same side is the Synodical Epistle of the Antiochene Council which condemned Paul of Samosata: ἀλλὰ μὴν καὶ τὸν νόμον ὁμοίως Μωνσή φαμὲν δεδόσθαι διακονοῦντος τοῦ νίοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ (Gal iii. 19: Exod iii. 2, 4, 16; iv. 1) (Exod xxxiii. 17--19) ὅπερ τελειοῦται οὕτως . . . With regard to EUSEBIUS, the facts seem to be as follows:-that he distinctly "quotes the passage with the "reading vibs not less than six times. In one case indeed (De Eccles. Theol. lib i. c. "9, vol vi. p. 840) the words ή μονογενής θεός are added after ὁ μονογενής υίός. This "passage alone, however, when carefully examined with the context, seems enough "to disprove this claim; and when it is taken in connexion with at least five other "unequivocal quotations in which Eusebius reads viós, there really appears to be no "room for doubt." (Mr. E. Abbot in the Andover "Bibliotheca Sacra," Oct. 1861.) The summary of the chapter in which the passage above referred to occurs is "that the Son does not subsist in the same way as τὰ πολλὰ κτίσματα." After quoting "This is my beloved Son," Eusebius goes on : αὐτοῦ τοιγαροῦν τοῦ τῶν ὅλων θεοῦ ταύτην αὐτῷ τὴν μαρτυρίαν παρασχομένου τοῦ τε εὐαγγελιστοῦ διαβρήδην αὐτὸν υίδυ μονογενή είναι διδάσκοντος δι' ων έφη "Θεὸν οὐδεὶς έωρακε πώποτε' ὁ μονογενής νίός, ἡ μονογενής θεός, ὁ ων εἰς τὸν πόλπον τοῦ πατρός, ἐκεῖνος ἐξηγήσατο." "ΑΤΗΑΝΑSIUS "apparently knew of no other reading but viós: he distinctly quotes the text 4 times, "and refers to it thrice in addition. HILARY has commented on his quotation

ὁ μον. υίός As regards the reading μονογενής θεός, the authorities for and against it will be found in the digest. It "of John i, 18 (De Trin, lib vi, cap 39, vol ii, p. 163) in such a way as to demon. 1. 35, 69 "strate that he read Filius. He remarks: Natura fides non satis explicata vide-"batur ex nomine 'Filii.' nisi proprietatis extrinsecus virtus per exceptionis signifi-"cantiam adderetur. Præter 'Filium' enim, et 'unigenitum' cognominans, suspi-"cionem adoptionis penitus exsecuit. The only passage, so far as I know, in all "Hilary's writings, which has even the appearance of supporting the reading uni-"genitus Deus is in his work De Trin. lib xii. cap 24, vol ii. p. 422. Having quoted " Exod iii. 14, ' Misit me ad ros is qui est' (& &v, LXX), and remarking Deo proprium "esse id quod est non ambigens sensus est, he goes on to argue that this expression "implies eternity, and then says: Quod igitur et per Moysen de Deo significatumid ipsum unigenito Deo esse proprium Evangelia testantur: cum in principio "erat verbum (John i. 1), et cum hoc apud Deum erat, et cum erat lumen verum (ver "9), et cum unigenitus Deus in sinu Patris est (ver 18), et cum Jesus Christus super "omnia Deus est (Rom ix. 5). 'Erat' igitur alque 'est;' quia ab eo est, qui quod "est semper est. From this it will be perceived that Hilary's argument rests wholly "on the word 'est." (Notwithstanding this, however, the impression naturally derived from the passage is that Hilary is here just as distinctly quoting John i. 18 (with the reading $\theta\epsilon\delta s$) as Rom ix. 5 immediately below. H. A.) "The expression "'unigenitus Deus' is a favourite one with Hilary. It occurs in his treatise De "Trinitate about one hundred and four times." (Abbot, ut supra.) The following is Abbot's list of the seven places in which Hilary quotes the passage with the reading Filius: Tract. in Psalmum exxxviii. cap 35, vol i. p. 578, Migne: De Tran. lib ii. cap 23, vol ii. p. 40; lib iv. capp 8, p. 76; 42, p. 101; lib v. capp 33, 34, pp. 125, 126; and lib vi. cap 39, p. 163.

The concurrent testimony of Hippolytus, the Synodical Epistle from Antioch, Eusebius, Athanasius, and apparently the whole of the Latin Fathers, is very strong. On the other side we have the Excerpta Theodoti, Epiphanius, Didymus, and perhaps Clement of Alexandria and the Synod of Ancyra A.D. 358.

ΤΠΕΟDOTUS says, John i. 1 is interpreted by the Valentinians thus: ἀρχὴν μὲν γὰρ τὸν μονογενῆ λέγουσιν, ὁν καὶ θεὸν προsαγορεύεσθαι, ὡς καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἐξῆς ἄντικρυς θεὸν αὐτὸν δηλοῖ λέγων "'Ο μονογενὴς θεός, ὁ ὢν ἐἰς τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρός, ἐκεῖνος ἐξηγήσατο." (Excerpta Theod. inter Opp. Clem. Alex. § 6, p. 958 P: but see Theod. § 9, p. 959.) CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, speaking of the difficulty of knowing God and of the impossibility of declaring God in words, brings forward Rom xi. 33: 1 Cor ii. 6, 7: Col ii. 2, 3: Ps lxxvii.: and Matt xiii. 11, 33: having added quotations from Solon and Empedocles, he goes on: καὶ Ἰωάννης ὁ ἀπόστολος "Θεὸν οὐδεὶς ἑώρακεν πώποτε ὁ μονογενὴς θεός, ὁ ὢν εἰς τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρός, ἐκεῖνος ἐξηγήσατο." τὸ δ' ἀόρατον καὶ ἄρῆητον, κόλπον ὀνομάσας θεοῦ. τοῦ δὲ ἀγεννήτου οὐδὲν προϋπάρχει. λείπεται δὴ θεία χάριτι καὶ μόνφ τῷ παρ' ἀὐτὸν λόγφ τὸ ἄγνωστον νοεῖν καθὸ καὶ ὁ Λουκᾶς (Αcts xvii. 22, 23). (Strom. v. 12, pp. 695, 696 P.) The only other passage in which Clement quotes John i. 18 is in "Quis dives salvetur," the opening words of ch xxxvii., p. 946 P: τί γὰρ ἔτι δεῖ θεῷ τὰ τῆς ἀγάπης μυστήρια; καὶ τότε ἐποπτεύσεις τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρός, ὸν ὁ μονογενὴς υίος θεὸς μόνος ἐξηγήσατο. It appears then that Clement knew of and used a reading or interpretation (it may be only the latter) of John i. 18 which sanctioned the use of the term μονογενῆς θεός

"[kv. cap 5 (bis?], vol i. (ii. Migne) p. 612, and kx. cap 7, p. 817). In the remark, "however, which follows the quotation in the first passage, θεός and νίός are inter- "changed: —καί φησι, "Ο μονογενὴς θεός" ὁ μὲν γὰρ λόγος ἐστὶν ἐκ πατρὸς γεννηθείς, "ὁ πατὴρ δὲ οὐκ ἐγεννήθη. διὰ τοῦτο μονογενὴς νίός. DIDYMUS has quoted the "passage twice with the reading θεός (De Trinit. lib i. cap 26, p. 393, and lib ii. cap "5, p. 495). He also says ὁ νίὸς κέκληται μονογενὴς θεὸς λόγος, καὶ εἶς κύριος Ἰησοῦς "χριστός (lib i. c. 15, p. 313). But here it may be doubted whether a comma should be placed after μονογενὴς, or after θεός, or after neither. The Second (semi-"arian) Synod of Ancyra may have read θεός in John i. 18, but the evidence is not "decisive. After quoting Prov viii. 22 &c., Col i. 15 &c., and the first verses of the

seems to have arisen from a confusion of the contracted forms of writing, TC and Θ C. The question, which reading to adopt, is one which, in the balance of authorities, must be provisionally decided by the consideration that as far as we can see, we "Proem to the Gospel of John, without any allusion, however, to John i. 18 " ώς ξχειν τὴν ἐπὶ στόματος δύο καὶ τριῶν μαρτύρων εἰς ἀπόδειξιν τῆς κατ' οὐσίαν πρὸς "πατέρα τοῦ υἰοῦ δμοιότητος. ὁ μὲν γὰρ (Solomon) τοῦ σοφοῦ τὴν τοφίαν υἰον ὁ δὲ (John) τοῦ θεοῦ τὸν λόγον μονογενῆ θεόν ὁ δὲ (Paul) τοῦ θεοῦ τὸν λόγον μονογενῆ θεόν ὁ δὲ (Paul) τοῦ θεοῦ τὸν υἰον εἰκόνα φησί "(Apud Epiph. Hær. lxxiii. cap 8, vol i. (ii. Migne) p. 854). We have no reason to "suppose, à priori, that the reference to John is verbally accurate any more than "that to Proverbs, where we find neither the word υἰος, nor the expression ἡ "σοφία τοῦ σοφοῦ. It is not uncommon with the Fathers to give as the language "of Scripture, expressions formed from several passages combined, or which they "regard as fully authorized by Scripture though not occurring there in so many "words." (Abbot, ut supra.)

The evidence from Irenæus, Origen, Basil, and Cyril of Alexandria, is contradictory and uncertain. It is hardly possible to decide what was the reading of the copies known to IRENÆUS: he quotes the passage three times; unigenitus Filius Dei in Haer. iii. 11. 6, p. 189, unigenitus Filius ib iv. 20. 6, p. 255, unigenitus Dens ib iv. 20. 11, p. 256. In no case is either word absolutely inconsistent with his context; as far as Irenœus' argument is concerned we might read 'He who is in the bosom of the Father hath declared Him.' In the two first cases we have Filius in the immediate context; in the third, Verbum, though Filius Dei is not far off. On the one hand, the translator may have conformed two of the quotations to the received Latin version. On the other hand, had Irenœus read $\theta \epsilon \delta_5$, his subject ("seeing God") must almost have compelled him to give some distinct exposition of its heaving must almost have compelled him to give some distinct exposition of its bearing.

CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, as edited by Aubert, has θεδς four "times, and νίδς three times. His commentary on the passage, as printed, favours

should be introducing great harshness into the sentence, and a new and strange term into Scripture, by adopting $\theta\epsilon\delta s$: a consequence which ought to have no weight whatever where authority is overpowering, but may fairly be weighed where this is not so. δῶν ϵἰς τ. κόλπον] The expression must not be understood as referring to the custom of reclining ἐν τῷ κόλπῳ, as in ch. xiii. 23: for by this explanation confusion is introduced into the imagery, and the real depth of the truth hidden. έξηγήσατο declared, better than hath declared, as E. V. έξηγέσμαι, έξήγησις, and έξηγητής (Gen. xli. 8, 24), are technical terms used of the declaration of divine matters. Wetstein has collected abundance of passages in illustration of this usage. See also Müller's Eumenides, Excursus D, on the έξηγηταί. But Lücke (and I think rightly) believes it more in accordance with the simple style of John to take the word here in its ordinary, not its technical meaning. The object to be supplied after the verb is most likely αὐτόν, i. e. τὸν θεόν. De Wette thinks this too definite, and supplies 'that which He has seen,' as in ch. iii. 11. Lücke supplies τὴν χάριτα κ. ἀλ., as being 'that which He has seen;' but De Wette well observes that xápis is more matter of revelation by act, than of έξήγησις. Enthymius's explanation, ἐδίδαξεν ὅτι θεὸν οὐδεὶς έώρακε πώποτε, is certainly wrong. See Matt. xi. 27.

19—11. 11.] INTRODUCTION OF CHRIST TO THE WORLD: BY THE WITNESS OF JOHN (vv. 19—40): BY HIMSELF (ver. 41—ii. 11).

19-28.] The first witness borne by John to Jesus: before the deputation from the Sanhedrim.

19.] αὕτη is the predicate, ἡ μαρτυρία the subject, in the present form of the sentence. So very frequently in St. John, where commonly the mistake is made of supposing the demonstrative pronoun to be the subject, whereas it is ever the predicate of identification. Euthym., αὕτη ἡ τερὶ ἢς εἰπεῖν μέλλει προϊών, ἡ γενομένη δηλονότι ὕτε ἀπεστ. κ.τ.λ.

oi 'loudaioi] John alone of the Evangelists uses this expression; - principally as designating the chiefs of the Jewish people, the members of the Sanhedrum. It is an interesting enquiry, what this usage denotes as to the author or date of our Gospel. Prof. Bleek, Beiträge, pp. 245-249, has satisfactorily shewn that no inference can be deduced from it against the Jewish origin of the author, as Bretschneider and Fischer endeavoured to do: but it is rather confirmatory of the belief that the Gospel was written after the Jews had ceased to be politically a nation,-and among Gentiles ;the author himself contemplating these έξ 'lερ. dues last as his readers. not belong to oi 'lovδ.,—nor to iep. κ. Λευ.,—but to ἀπέστειλαν:—sent from Jerusalem priests, &c. : so έξαποστέλλω, Acts vii. 12; xi. 22 al. ίερ. κ. Λ. This was a formal deputation; - priests and Levites, constituting the two classes of persons employed about the service of the temple (see Josh. iii. 3), are sent (Matt. xxi. 23) officially to enquire into the pretensions of the new Teacher (ver. 25), who had collected about him such multitudes (Matt. iii. 5), and had awakened popular expectation that he was the Messiah (Luke iii. 15). σὺ τίς εἰ;—with reference to the popular doubts respecting him; asked in an unbelieving and inquisitorial spirit, - compare Matt. iii. 7 ff., which had already taken place. Even among the learned, as well as among the people, there were considerable differences as to the prophecies respecting the Messiah: see ch. vii. 40-52. ώμολόγησεν, he openly and formally confessed. This emphatic notice of his declaration seems to be introduced not with any view of removing too high an estimate of John's work and office, as sometimes supposed, but rather to shew the importance of his testimony, which was so publicly and officially delivered,-that the Messiah was come (see ch. v. 33-35); and the way in which he depreciated him-

'Hà(as $\epsilon \dot{\iota}$;] The whole appearance of John reminded them of Elias: -see Matt. iii. 4, and compare 2 Kings i. 8. Besides, his announcement that the Kingdom of God was at hand, naturally led them to the prophecy Mal. iv. 5. Lightfoot cites from the Rabbinical books testimonies that the Jews expected a general purification or baptism before the coming of the Messiah (from Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 26, and Zech. xiii. 1), and that it would be administered by Elias.

κ. λ. Οὐκ εἰμί] The right explanation of this answer seems to be the usual one, - that the deputation asked the question in a mistaken and superstitious sense, meaning Elias bodily come down from heaven, who was expected to forerun and anoint the Messias. (Our Lord seems to refer to the same extravagant notion in Matt. xi. 14, εὶ θέλετε δέξασθαι, αὐτός ἐστιν Ἡλ. ὁ μέλλων ἔρχεσθαι.) In this sense, John was not Elias; nor indeed in any other sense, was he Elias:—but only (Luke i. 17) ἐν πνεύματι και δυνάμει 'Ηλίου. ὁ προφ. εἶ στύ;] From the prophecy of Moses, Deut. xviii. 15, 18, the Jews expected some particular prophet to arise,distinct from the Messiah (this distinction however was not held by all, see ch. vi. 14), -whose coming was, like that of Elias, intimately connected with that of the Messiah Himself: see ch. vii. 40, 41. In Matt. xvi. 14 we have 'Jeremiah, or one of the prophets' apparently = this expected prophet. There seem to have been various opinions about him; -all however agreeing in this, that he was to be one of the old prophets raised from the dead (see also 2 Macc. ii. 1-8). This John was not: and he therefore answers this also in the negative. 22.] Notice—they ever ask about his person: he ever refers them to his office. He is no one-a voice merely : it is the work of God, the testimony to Christ which is every thing. So the formalist ever in the church asks Who is he? while the witness for Christ only exalts, only cares for Christ's work. These words, which by the other Evangelists are spoken of John as the fulfilment of the prophecy, appear from this place to have been first so used by himself. They introduce the great closing section of the prophecy of Isaiah (ch. xl.-lxvi.) so full of the rich promises and revelations of the Messiah and His kingdom. εὐθύνατε is used as compendiously expressing évoiμάσατε . . . εὐθείας ποιεῖτε. implication, the Baptist, quoting this opening prophecy of himself, announces the approaching fulfilment of the whole section. 24.] The reason of this explanation being added is not very clear. Lücke, with whom De Wette agrees, refers it to the apparent hostility of the next enquiry: but I confess I cannot see that it is more hostile than the preceding. Luthardt thinks that it imports, there were some ἀπεσταλμένοι present, who belonged to the sect of the Pharisees (ήσαν δε καί εκ των Φαρ. ἀπεσταλμένοι), which the words will hardly bear: see below. Might it not be to throw light on their question about baptizing, as the Pharisees were the most precise about all ceremonies, lustrations, &c.? Origen makes this a new deputation: but he is plainly wrong: see the our below. Euthymius gives another reason yet: ἐπεσημήνατο και την αίρεσιν αὐτῶν, ἐμφαίνων τό περίεργον τούτων και σκολιόν.

Abandoning the oi (see var. readd.), we must render, And they (i. e. the whole deputation) were (or had been) sent by the Pharisees; which will make it more probable that the explanation refers to the nature of the following question. ἀποστέλλομαι . . . έκ has occurred above, ver. 19, which gives additional probability to the reading of the text. οὐδὲ οὐδέ, see note on ver. 13. question shews probably that they did not interpret Isa. xl. 3 of any herald of the Messiah. They regarded baptism as a significant token of the approach of the Messianic Kingdom, and they asked, 'Why baptizest thou, if thou art no forerunner of the Messiah?' [o] οπίσω μου έρχ. is the subject of the sentence; He that cometh after me, &c., stands among you. The insertions (see var. readd.) have been made by some one not aware of this, and wishing to square the verse with vv. 15, 30.

The answer of the Baptist seems not to correspond to the question in ver. 25. This was noticed as early as Heracleon (Origen in Joan. tom. vi. 15, vol. iv. p. 131), who said, ἀποκρίνεται ὁ Ἰωάννης τοις έκ των Φαρισαίων πεμφθείσιν, οὺ πρός δ έκεῖνοι ἐπηρώτων, ἀλλ' δ αὐτός ἐβούλετο. This however is impugned at some length by Origen, but not on very convincing grounds. The truth seems to have been apprehended by Olshausen,—that the declaration of John that the Messiah was standing among them at that moment unknown to them, was an answer to their question demanding a legitimation of his prophetic claims;—a σημείον that he was sent from God :- see ch. ii. 18. Olsh. also suggests that this may clear up the saying of the Jews in ch. x. 41 (see note there). In repeating this saying at other times (see Matt. iii. 11 and ||), the Baptist plainly states of the Messiah, that he should baptize them with the Holy Ghost (and fire), as here in ver. 33. Here, in speaking to those learned in the offices of the Messiah, he leaves that to be supplied.

He goes on to shew from the elymology of the names that it must have been Bethabara; an argument which modern criticism will not much esteem. It will be seen that his testimony is decisive for the universality and authority of Bηθανία, while for the other he only produces a tradition, and that only at secondhand: "they say that such a place is shewn." That no Bethany beyond Jordan was known in his time proves but little;for 300 eventful years had changed the face of Palestine since these events, and the names and sites of many obscure places may have been forgotten. I abstain from enumerating modern conjectures on the identity of the two, or the etymology of the names, as being inde-cisive and unprofitable. The objection of Paulus, that πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου the Sanhedrim had no authority, appears not to be founded in fact: see Lücke's Comm. The question whether this testimony of the Baptist is identical with that given by the three other Evangelists, especially by Luke (iii. 16), is, after all that has been said on it (Lücke, De Wette, Olshausen, &c.), not of great importance. The whole series of transactions here recorded, from ver. 15 onwards, certainly happened after the baptism of our Lord; -for before that event John did not know Him as δ έρχόμενος: and μέσος έμῶν στήκει ver. 26 shews that he had so recognized Him (see below on τη ἐπαύρ.): whereas the testimony in Luke in. 16 and ||, is as certainly given before the bantism. But since the great end of John's mission was to proclaim Him who was coming after him, it is not only probable, but absolutely necessary to suppose, that he should have delivered this testimony often, and under varying circumstances: before the baptism, in the form given by Luke, Epxeral & ioxup. μου κ.τ.λ., and after it in this form, obvos hu bu elmou (ver. 15), where his former testimony is distinctly referred to. And among John's disciples and the multitudes who frequented his baptism, many reports of such his sayings would naturally be current. So that there is neither a real nor even an apparent contradiction between John and the other Evangelists. It is a far more important question, in what part of this narration the forty days' Temptation is to be inserted. From ver. 19 to ch. ii. 1 there is an unbroken sequence of days distinctly marked. Since then ver. 19 must be understood as happening after the baptism, it must have happened after the Temptation also. And in this supposition there is not the slightest difficulty. But when we have made it, it still remains to say whether at that time our Lord had returned from the Temptation or not. The general opinion of Harmonists has been, that the approach of Jesus to John in ver. 29 was His return after the Temptation. But this I think questionable, on account of the μέσος δμών στήκει, ver. 26; which I can only understand literally. I therefore believe that the return from the Temptation to Bethany beyond Jordan had taken place before the deputation arrived.

29-34. Second witness borne by John to Jesus: apparently before his disciples. 29.] τῆ ἐπαύριον, the day after. Those who wish to introduce the Temptation between vv. 28 and 29, interpret it, 'on some day after.' Thus Euthym. τη έπ., μετά την ἀπὸ ερήμου κάθοδον αὐτοῦ δηλονότι. But this sense of τῆ ἐπ., although certainly found in the LXX,see Gen. xxx. 33,-is not according to the usage of John (see reff.), and would be quite alien from the precision of this whole portion of the narrative, which, ver. 40, specifies even the hours of the day. understand it therefore literally, both here and in vv. 35 and 44. έρχ. π. αὐτ.] It is not said whence, or why, or whether

for the purpose of an interview, or not; the fact merely is related, for the sake of the testimony which follows. I mention this, because on these points difficulties have been raised. ίδε ὁ άμν. τ. θ. This is one of the most important and difficult sayings in the N.T. The question to be answered is, in calling Jesus by so definite a name as ὁ ἀμνὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, to what did John refer? And this question is intimately connected with that of the meaning of the following words, ὁ αῖρων την άμαρτίαν τοῦ κόσμου. (a) The title must refer to some known and particular lamb, and cannot be a mere figure for a just and holy man, as Kuinoel and Gabler suppose. It is inconceivable, that & aurds τοῦ θεοῦ should in a testimony so precise and formal as this of the Baptist, be nothing but an hyperbole, and that one wholly unprecedented, and to his hearers unintelligible. Had no doctrinal considerations been at stake, we may safely say that this interpretation would never have been proposed. In its bearing on the latter clause of the verse, it is equally untenable. These interpreters make à alpuv τ. άμ. τ. κόσ. to mean, "qui pravitatem hominum per vitam suam graviter quidem etsi innocens experietur, sed agni instar mala sibi inflicta patiente et mansueto animo sustinebit" (Gabler); or, "Hic removebit peccata hominum, i. e. pravitatem e terra." The first of these meanings of alpeir is altogether without example:that cited from 1 Macc. xiii. 17, not being applicable. The second, though common enough in other connexions, is never found with ἀμαρτίαν: see reff. The commonsense account of this part of the matter is: -John wished to point out Jesus as the Messiah: he designates Him as the Lamb of God; he therefore referred to some definite lamb,-revealed by God, sent by God, pleasing to God, or in some meaning especially, τοῦ θεοῦ. Whence did this idea come? (β) Can John have referred to the paschal lamb? Further than that the very use of the name brings in with it the general typical use of the animal, and that thus this particular use may lie in the background, I think not, -and for this reason :- The dominant idea in the paschal sacrifice has no connexion, in any sense of the words, with αίρειν την άμαρτίαν. However by the light now thrown back on it since the Spirit has opened the things of Christ, we discern this typical meaning in the sprinkling of the blood (see

1 Cor. v. 7),-in the Jewish mind, no 1. 33. 69 mention being made of sin or the removing of sin in any connexion with the paschal lamb, the two could not be brought forward, in such an announcement as this, in close connexion with one another.

(y) Can the reference be to the lamb of the daily morning and evening sacrifice? or to the sacrificial lamb generally? With the same reservation as above, I think not: for (1) this expression is too definite to have so general and miscellaneous a reference; (2) of many animals which were used for sacrifice, the lamb was only one, and that one not by any means so prominent as to serve as a type for the whole: and (3) the lamb (with only two exceptions, Levit. iv. 32 : Num. vi. 14, in both which cases it was to be a female, as if for express distinction from the ordinary use of the lamb) was never used for a sinoffering, properly so called and known. The question is not, whether Christ be not typified by all these offerings, which we now know to be the case (1 Pet. i. 19 al.), but whether the Baptist is likely to have referred to them in such words as these.

(δ) There remains but one reference, and that is, to the prophetic announcement in Isa. liii. 7. The whole of that latter section of Isaiah, as before remarked on ver. 23, is Messianic, and was so understood by the Jews (see my Hulsean Lectures for 1841, pp. 62-66). We have there the servant of God (= the Messiah) compared to a lamb brought to the slaughter (liii. 7), and it is said of Him (ib. ver. 4), οὖτος τας άμαρτίας ήμων φέρει και περί ήμων όδυναται-ver. 5, αύτδς δέ έτραυματίσθη δια τας αμαρτίας ήμων-ver. 6, καὶ κύριος παρέδωκεν αὐτὸν ταῖς άμαρτίαις ἡμῶνver. 8, αίρεται ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς ἡ ζωὴ αὐτοῦ, ἀπό τῶν ἀνομιῶν τοῦ λαοῦ μου ήχθη εἰς θάνατον—ver. 12, καὶ αὐτὸς ἀμαρτίας πολλών ανήνεγκε καὶ διὰ τὰς ἀνομίας αὐτῶν παρεδόθη. So that here, and here only, we have the connexion of which we are in search,—between the lamb, and the bearing or taking away of sin,-expressly stated, so that it could be formally referred to in a testimony like the present. And I have therefore no doubt that this was the (ε) We have now to enquire into the specific meaning of o aipwv τὴν ἀμαρτίαν τοῦ κόσμου (see above under (a)). αἴρειν answers to the Heb. κτρ., which is used frequently in the O. Num. v. 31; xiv. 34: Ezek. iv. 5; xxiii. 35 al.: -and variously rendered in the LXX by avapépeur, as above, Isa. liii. 11, 12, or φέρειν, ib. ver. 4,-or λαμβάνειν, Ezek. iv. 5; xviii. 19: Num. v. 31; xiv. 34: Levit. xxiv. 15. ἀφαιρείν (which though not a compound of alpeir, seems to have almost been adopted as such, the actual compound ἀπαίρειν being intransitive) is used in the sense of 'taking away of sin and its guilt,' but taking it away by expiation: see Exod. xxxiv. 7: Levit. x. 17: Num. xiv. 18. The word in our verse will bear either of these meanings, or both conjoined; for if the Lamb is to suffer the burden of the sins of the world, and to take away sin and its guilt by expiation, this result must be accomplished by the offering of Himself. (() it is objected, that this view of a suffering Messiah and of expiation by the sufferings of one, was alien from the Jewish expectations; - and that the Baptist (see Matt. xi. 2 ff. and note) cannot himself have had any such view. But the answer to this may be found in the fact that the view, though not generally prevalent among the Jews, was by no means un-known to many. The application by the early Jewish expositors of Isa. liii. to the Messiah, could hardly have been made, without the idea of the suffering and death of their Messiah being presented to their minds. The same would be the case in the whole sacrificial economy:-the removal of guilt (which was universally ascribed to the Messiah) by suffering and death would be familiarized to their minds. Traces of this are found in their own writings. In 2 Macc. vii. 37, 38, the last of the seven brethren thus speaks before his martyrdom : ἐγὰ δὲ καθάπερ οἱ ἀδελφοί μου και σώμα και ψυχήν προδίδωμι περί που και σωμα και ψυχην προσιασμα ττών πατρίων νόμων, ἐπικαλούμενος τὸν θεὸν Ἰλεων ταχὺ τῷ ἔθνει γενέσθαι, καὶ σὲ μετὰ ἐτασμῶν καὶ μαστίγων ἐξομολογήσασθαι, διότι μόνος αὐτὸς θεός ἐστιν. ἐν ἐμοὶ δὲ καὶ τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς μου στῆναι την τοῦ παντοκράτορος ὀργην την ἐπὶ τὸ σύμπαν ήμῶν γένος δικαίως ἐπηγμένην. And Josephus, de Maccab. § 17 (4 Macc. xvii. 22), says of these same martyrs, that they were ως περ αντίψυχον της τοῦ έθνους άμαρτίας. και διὰ τοῦ αίματος των εὐσεβων ἐκείνων καὶ (τοῦ) ίλαστηρίου τοῦ θανάτου αὐτῶν ἡ θεία πρόνοια τὸν Ἰσραὴλ προκακωθέντα διέσωσε. The whole history of the sacrifices and devotions of the heathen world abounds with examples of the same idea variously brought forward; and to these the betterinformed among the Jews could be no strangers. And as to the Baptist himself, we must not forget that the power of the Holy Spirit which enabled him to recognize by a special sign the Redeemer, also spoke in him, and therefore his words would not be the result of education merely, or his own reasoning, but of that kind of intuitive perception of divine truth, which those have had who have been for any special purpose the organs of the Holy Ghost. And as regards Matt. xi. 3, the doubt on the mind of John there expressed does not appear to have touched at all on the matter now in question,-but to have rather been a form of expressing his impatience at the slow and quiet progress of Him of whom he expected greater things and a more rapid public manifestation. See this whole enquiry pursued at greater length in Lücke's Commentary, vol. i. pp. 401-416, from whence the substance of this note is taken. 30. See on ver. 15.

31. On the apparent discrepancy between this statement, ούκ ηδειν αὐτόν, and St. Matthew's narrative, I have stated my view on Matt. iii. 14. Both accounts are entirely consistent with the supposi-tion that John had been from youth upwards acquainted with our Lord, and indeed may have in his own mind believed Him to be the Christ :- but having (ver. 33) a special sign appointed him, by which to recognize Him as such,-until that sign was given, he, like the rest of the people (κάγω, I also, see ver. 26), had no certain knowledge of Him. Lücke's whole note proceeds upon the unworthy view of the historical character of the Gospels The same which his school has adopted. may be said of Neander, Leben Jesu, pp. De Wette gives the sense well: "This testimony (ver. 30) does not rest upon my long personal acquaintance with Him, but on that which happened during my work of baptizing." ahl iva dav.] Justin Martyr represents Trypho the Jew saying, χριστός δε εί και γεγέννηται, και

The occurrence related by John happened at the baptism of Jesus, which is therefore here pre-supposed as known. Although this has been questioned (Usteri, Nachrichten über den Täufer J. u.s.w., cited by Lücke, i. 423), I cannot see how it can be reasonably doubted. We cannot surely suppose that such a sign was twice shewn. On the appearance itself, see note Matt. iii. 16. The account here given confirms the view which I have there maintained, that the appearance was confined to our Lord and the Baptist: he was to receive the sign, and then to testify to the others, who were not themselves yet the bearers, but the recipients of testimony: -κατά τινα πνευματικήν θεωρίαν ώφθη μόνφ τῷ Ἰωάννη. εμεινεν έπ' αὐτ. By some appearance which is not described, the Holy Spirit was manifested to John as not removing from Jesus again, but abiding on Him. But we are not to understand that he had seen the Spirit descending on others, and not abiding; for (see ch. vii. 39: Acts i. 5; xix. 2 ff.) the gift of the Holy Spirit did not ordinarily accompany John's baptism, but only in this one case; and its occurrence was to point out to him the Messiah. οῦτ. ἐστ. ὁ βαπτ. ἐν πν. ἁγ.] Here again we seem to have a reference to the synoptic cycle of narratives, for our Evangelist has not before mentioned this office of the Messiah. 34. computing time. So Persius, Sat. iii. 3: "Stertimus . . . quinta dum linea tangitur umbra." They remained with Him the rest of that day, which would be four or five hours, and need not strictly be limited by sunset. 41.7 Who the other disciple was, is not certain: but considering (1) that the Evangelist never names himself in his Gospel, and (2) that this account is so minutely accurate as to specify even the hours of the day, and in all respects bears marks of an eye-witness, and again (3) that this other disciple, from this last circumstance, certainly would have been named, had not the name been suppressed for some especial reason, we are justified in inferring that it was the Evangelist himself. And such has been the general opinion. Euthymius gives an alternative which is hardly probable: ἡ διότι οὐκ ἦν τῶν ἐπισήμων και γνωρίμων έκεινος, ή ὅτι αὐτὸς ην δ ταῦτα γράφων. 42. μεσσίαν = πτής = not ο χριστός, but χριστός: being the identification simply of the two words, not here of the two tilles. 43. This is evidently the first bestowal of the new name on Simon:

and it is done from our Lord's prophetic knowledge of his future character: see note on Matt. xvi. 18. היפא = Knpas Aramaic, p Hebrew, a stone. The Greek name Peter became the prevalent one in the apostolic Church very soon: Paul uses both names indiscriminately. I cannot but think with Bengel, Paulus, and Strauss, that the knowledge of Simon shewn by the Lord is intended to be miraculous. So also Stier, i. 31 f. edn. 2, " I know who and what thou art from thy birth till thy present coming to me..... I name thee, I give thee a new name, I know what I will make of thee in thy following of Me and for my Kingdom." The emphatic use of $\epsilon \mu \beta \lambda \epsilon \psi$ as here (it is not so emphatic in ver. 36, but still even there may imply fixed contemplation, in the power of the Spirit, who suggested the testimony) is hardly accountable except on this explanation of supernatural knowledge. Similarly Abram, Sara, Jacob, received new names in reference to the covenant and promises of God to fourth day after ver. 19. Our Lord is on the point of setting out from the valley of the Jordan to Galilee, and finds Philip, with whom there is every reason to believe He was previously acquainted (see ver. 45). Here we find Jesus himself calling a disciple, for the first time. But ἀκολούθει does not here bear its strict apostolic sense; the εὐρήκαμεν afterwards, and the going to search for others to be disciples, unites Philip to the company of those who have been before mentioned, who we know were not immediately or inseparably attached as followers to Jesus.

45. On the futility of Mr. Greswell's distinction between and as signifying mere habitation, and &k, nativity, see reff. and note on ch. xi. 1. This is Bethsaida on the Western bank of the lake of Gennesareth; another Bethsaida (Julias) lay at the top of the lake, on the Jordan. See note on Luke ix. 10. 46.] It does not appear where Nathanael was found: but he is described, ch. xxi. 2, as ὁ ἀπὸ Κανᾶ τῆς Γαλιλαίας: and as we find Jesus there, ch. ii. 1, it is probable the call may have taken place in its neighbour-hood. Nathanael ("בְּבָּאֵל, i. q. Θεόδωρος, gift of God." Wordsw.) is mentioned only in these two places. From them we should gather that he was an Apostle; and as his name is no where found in the catalogues of the Twelve, but Philip is associated in three of them (Matt. x. 3: Mark iii. 18: Luke vi. 14) with Bartholomew, it has been supposed that Nathanael and Bartholomew were the same person (see note on Matt. x. 3). This is however mere conjecture.

Mωυσης έν τ. ν., probably in Deut. xviii. 15; but also in the promises to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 7 al.: and in the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 10, and the Prophets, passim: see the reff. in E. V. νίον τοῦ Ἰωσ. τ. ἀπὸ Ν. This expression seems to shew previous acquaintance on the part of Philip with Jesus. No stress can be laid, as has been most unfairly done by Lücke, De Wette, and others, on Jesus being called by Philip, the son of Joseph, as indicating that the history of His birth and childhood, as related by Matt. and Luke, was unknown to John. Philip expresses what was the prevailing belief, in the ordinary words, as Olshausen remarks. In an admirable note, Leben Jesu, p. 23 ff., Neander remarks, that by combining the two declarations of John, that in Jesus the Eternal Word of God became flesh (ver. 14), and that 'that which is born of the flesh is flesh' (ch. iii. 6), we cannot escape the inference, that a supernatural working of God in the conception of the Man Christ Jesus is implied.

47.] As Lücke observes, the meaning of this question is simpler than at first sight appears. It is impossible that Nathanael, himself a Galilæan, could speak from any feeling of contempt for Galilee generally: and we have no evidence that Nazareth was held in contempt among the Galilæans. He alluded therefore to the smallness and insignificance of the town in proportion to the great things which were now predicated of it. Nazareth is never named in the O. T. nor in Josephus. Evangelist certainly intends a supernatural insight by the Lord into Nathanael's character to be here understood; and there is probably no reference at all to the question which Nathanael had just asked. To suppose that Jesus overheard that question, is just one of those perfectly gratuitous assumptions which the very Commentators who here make this supposition are usually the first to blame. Compare ch. ii. 25. ἀληθ. Ἰσρ.] 'An Israelite who truly answers to the inner and honourable meaning of the name.' When we reflect what was contained in that name, and Who it is that speaks, we can hardly agree with De Wette that the words are spoken merely in the spirit in which every nation attaches some peculiar virtue, and especially those of openness and straightforwardness, to itself, as beutsch heraussagen, beutsche Treue, or Cicero's "Romano more loqui."

Our Lord probably referred to Ps. xv. 49.] The remark was overheard by Nathanael, and recognized as indicating perfect knowledge of his character. The question πόθ. με γιν. is one of astonishment, but not perhaps yet of suspicion of any thing supernatural. Our Lord's answer first opens this to him. τοῦ $\kappa.\tau.\lambda$.] It would be doubtful whether όντα ύπὸ τ. συκ. belong to φωνήσαι or to είδόν σε, did not ver. 51 decide for the latter construction. The whole form of our Lord's answer seems to indicate that the place where Philip called Nathanael was not now in sight, nor had been. The declaration that Jesus had seen him there, at once brings the conviction which he expresses in the next verse. would not have been the case, unless the sight had been evidently and unquestionably supernatural: and unless the words ούντα ύπο την συκην involved this. Had Jesus merely seen Nathanael without being seen by him, (De Wette,) or had είδον σε only expressed 'I knew thy character,' at first sight, 'although at a distance' (Lücke), no such immediate conviction would have followed. ὄντα ὑπὸ τὴν συκῆν, says Wordsw., "is something more than ὑπὸ τῆ συκῆ—the accusative indicates retirement thither as well as concealment there,—perhaps for purposes of prayer and meditation." In fact it contains in it, 'when thou wentest under the fig-tree, and while thou wert there.'

Ver. 50 = 'Thou art the Messiah:' see Ps. ii. 7. ch. xi. 27: Matt. xvi. 16: Luke xxii. 70. Olshausen (ii. 77 ff.) maintains that ὁ νί. τ. θ. was not a Jewish appellation for the Messiah, - on account of the Jews taking up stones to cast at Jesus when He so called Himself, ch. x. 33. But as Lücke observes (i. 456, note), it was not for the mere use of this Name, but for using it in a close and literal sense which was unintelligible and appeared blasphemous to them, έγω κ. ὁ πατηρ εν έσμεν,—that they wished to stone Him: see note on ch. x. 36. It was certainly not so common a name as 'the Son of David,' for the Messiah. Nathanael can hardly have meant the name in other than its popular meaning; and the synonymous and better known appellation which he adds, confirms this. 51.] Our Lord says this not in blame, rather in praise of the simple and honest expression of Nathanael's conviction; but principally to shew him, that if he believed by reason of this comparatively small proof of His divine power, his faith would increase from strength to strength at the greater proofs which should from that time forward be given. It is perhaps best to set a question at πιστεύεις; but see notes on the similar sentences, ch. xvi. 31, and xn. 29. 52.] ἀμὴν ἀμήν is peculiar to John. The other Evangelists use ἀμήν once only in such asseverations. The LXX do not use it in this sense. Stier remarks (i. 36, edn. 2), that the Verily, verily, I say unto you of the Lord, is spoken in His coequality with the Father: not as the 'Thus saith the Lord' of the Prophets. ὑμῖν] The words following are then spoken to all the disciples present, not only to Nathanael.

With or without ἀπ' ἄρτι, the meaning will be much the same. The glories of a period beginning from the opening of the Lord's public ministry, and at this day not yet completed, are described. For it is not the outward visible opening of the material heavens, nor ascent and descent of angels in the sight of men, which our Lord here announces; but the series of glories which was about to be unfolded in His Person and Work from that time forward. Lüther, cited by Lücke. i. 458, beautifully says: "When Christ became man and had entered on His ministerial office and begun to preach, then was the heaven opened, and remains open; and has from that time, since the baptism of Christ in the Jordan, never been shut, and never will be shut, although we do not see it with our bodily eyes . . . Christ says this: 'Ye are now heavenly citizens, and have your citizenship above in the heavenly Jerusalem, and are in communion with the holy angels, who shall without intermission ascend and descend about you."

The opening of heaven is a symbolical expression, signifying the imparting of divine grace, help, and revelation. See Gen. xxviii. 10-17: Ezek. i. 1: Isa. vi. 1: Mai. iii. 10: Isa. lxiv. 1: also Deut. xi. 17: 1 Kings viii. 35.

have a plain reference to the ladder of Jacob, and imply that what he then saw was now to receive its fulfilment: that He, the Son of Man, was the dwelling of God and the gate of Heaven, and that through Him, and on Him in the first place, was to descend all communication of help and grace from above. no allusion is meant to the Transfiguration, or the Agony, is plain; for all those here addressed did not witness these appearances, but Peter and John only; nor to the Ascension, for they did not see heaven opened, nor did angels ascend nor descend. The above has (remarks Olsh. ii. 79) been the interpretation of all Commentators of any depth in all times: Origen as well as Augustine, Luther as well as Calvin, Lücke as well as Tholuck: and I may add, De Wette as τὸν υί. τ. ἀνθ.]. Απ well as Stier. expression originally (as appears) derived, in its Messianic sense, from Dan. vii. 13, 14, and thenceforward used as one of the titles of the Messiah (see ch. xii. 34). It is never predicated of our Lord by any but Himself, except in Acts vii. 56 by Stephen, in allusion apparently to Matt. xxvi. 64, and-which is hardly an exception-in the passages of the Revelation (ch. i. 13; xiv. 14) which are almost citations from Daniel.

Asher, which must be distinct from this. Jerome however in his Onomasticon believes it to have been the same. It was the residence, and probably birth-place, of Nathanael. If his calling took place in its neighbourhood, our Lord may have gone on and spent the intervening day at Dr. Robinson, Bib. Res. Nazareth. iii. 204 ff., satisfactorily establishes that Kâna-el-Jelîl, about 3 hours N. & E. from Nazareth, is the site of this miracle. The name is identical, and so stands in the Arabic version of the N. T. He shews this to have been recognized in early tradition, and its honour to have been only recently usurped by Kefr Kenna, a village 11 hour N.E. from Nazareth, on one of the roads to Tiberias. [See a very interesting description of Kâna-el-Jelîl in "The Land and the Book," pp. 426, 427.] ή μήτηρ τ. 'I.] John never names

This would be the probable reason for Jesus Himself being invited; but the disciples, being from various places in the district, can hardly all have been (De Wette) friends of the family. The fact of Jesus having attached disciples to Himself must have been known, and they were doubtless invited from consideration Our Lord at once opens His ministry with the character which He gives of himself Matt. xi. 18, 19, as distinguished from the asceticism of John. He also, as Trench admirably remarks (Miracles, edn. 2, p. 98, note), gives us his own testimony against the tendency which our indolence ever favours, of giving up those things and occasions to the world and the devil, which we have not Christian boldness to mingle in and purify. Even Cyprian, for instance, proscribes such festivals,-" nuptiarum festa improba et convivia lasciva vitentur, quorum periculosa contagio est." De Habitu Virginum, ch. xxi. p. 460. And such is the general verdiet of modern religionism, which would keep the leaven distinct from the lump, for fear it should become unleavened. The especial honour conferred upon marriage by the Lord should also be noticed. "He here adorned and beautified it with his presence, and first miracle that He 3. There is no neceswrought." sity to suppose that the feast had lasted several days, as De Wette and Lücke do. It has been suggested that the unexpected presence of the disciples may have occasioned a failure in the previously sufficient supply: a gloss in the old latin cod. Rhedigerianus has, "et factum est per multam turbam vocatorum vinum consummari." The mother of Jesus evidently is in a position of authority (see ver. 5) in the house, which was probably that of a near relative. The conjectures and traditions on the subject are many, but wholly unsatisfactory. A graver question arises as to the intent with which this olvov ouk ex. was said. She cannot have had from experience any reason to suppose that her Son would work a miracle, for this (ver. 11) was His first. Chrysostom suggests (so also Theophyl., Euthym., and Neander, L. J. p. 271) that, knowing Him to be Who He was, she had been by the recent divine acknowledgment of Him and His calling disciples to Himself, led to expect the manifestation of his Messianic power about this time; and here seemed an occasion for it. Some of the other explanations are: "that she had always found Him a wise counsellor, and mentioned the want to Him merely that He might suggest some way of remedying it." Cocceius, cited by Trench. " Velim discedas, ut ceteri item discedant, antequam penuria patefiat." Bengel. "Ut pia aliqua exhortatione convivis tædium eximeret, ac simul levaret pudorem sponsi." Calvin, cited by Lücke. "Jesus had wrought miracles, but in secret, before this." Tholuck. On the whole, the most probable explanation is that of Lücke, which somewhat modifies the first here mentioned,-that our Lord Himself had recently given some reason to expect that He would shew forth His glory by wonderful works. So, very nearly, Stier, R. J. i. 38, edn. 2. 4.7 The answer of our Lord is beyond question one of reproof, and disclaimer of participation in the grounds on which the request was made. See instances, besides reff., in Josh. xxii. 24: Mark i. 24. And so all the early expositors understood it. Irenæus (iii. 16.6, p. 206) says, "Dominus repellens ejus intempestivam festinationem, dixit," &c.; -and Chrysostom, εβούλετο έαυτην λαμπροτέραν ποιησαι διὰ τοῦ παιδός. and therefore He σφοδρότερον απεκρίνατο. Hom. xxi. in Joh., vol. viii. p. 122. The Romanist expositors mostly endeavour to divest the answer of any aspect of rebuke, and maintain that it was so uttered for our sakes alone, to teach us that He did not perform His miracles from regard to human affinity, but solely from love and His object of manifesting His glory. So Maldonatus. And this is true:—but first among those to be taught this, was she herself, who had tempted Him to work a miracle from that regard.

It has perhaps not been enough noticed, that in this answer the Lord declares His period of subjection to her as His earthly parent to be at an end. Henceforth His thoughts are not her thoughts. At twelve years of age, see Luke ii. 49, He answers 'thy father and I,' by 'My Father:'-now, He is to be no longer before the world as Mary's son, but as sanctified by the Father and sent into the world :- compare Matt. xii. 48-50, and Luke xi. 27, 28, and see Stier's admirable remarks, R. J. i. 39, edn. 2, also γύναι] There is Olshausen's, ii. 81. no reproach in this term: but rather respect. The Lord henceforth uses it towards her, not calling her 'mother,' even on the Cross (see ch. xix. 26), doubtless for the reason alleged above. ήκ. ἡ ὥρα μου] This expression is generally used in John of the time of the Death of Christ: see reff. But it is only so used because His death is in those passages the subject naturally underlying the narrative. It is, any fixed or appointed time;—and therefore here, the appointed time of His self-manifestation by miracles. This time was not yet come, but was close at hand. Some have supposed that the wine was not yet wholly exhausted, and that our Lord would wait till the miracle should be undoubted (so Trench, p. 192): but Stier well remarks that the known depth of all His early sayings forbids us from attaching only this meaning to it; -and he sees in it'a reference to the great marriage-feast and the new fruit of the vine in the Kingdom of God (i. 41, edn. 2). If this be so, it can be only in the background; the words must have had a present meaning, and I believe it to be, 'My time, the time at which, from the Father's appointment and my own concurring will, I am to begin miraculous working, is not yet arrived: forestall it not.' Very similarly He speaks, ch. vii. 6, to His brethren, and yet afterwards goes up to the feast. The notion that $\dot{\eta}$ $\omega_{\rho\alpha}$ $\mu_{\sigma\nu}$ refers to the hour of our Lord's human infirmity on the Cross when (ch. xix. 27) He "ac-knowledged her as His mother," Wordsw., seems wholly unfounded. Where do we find any such special acknowledgment there? And why should we go out of our way for a fanciful sense of words which bear an excellent meaning as referring to circumstances then present?

5.] There certainly seems beneath this narrative to lie some incident which is not told us. For not only is Mary not repelled by the answer just given, but she is convinced that the miracle will be wrought, and she is not without an anticipation of the method of working it:
for how should He require the aid of the servants, except the miracle were to take place according to the form here related?
I believe we shall find, when all things

a previous hint given her, -where or how I would not presume to say, -by our Lord, of His intention and the manner of performing it, and that her fault was, the too rash hastening on of what had been His fixed purpose. 6. These vessels were for tle washings usual at feasts: see Mark vii. 4. There could be no collusion or imposture here, as they were watervessels, and could have no remnants of wine in them (see also ver. 10). And the large quantity which they held could not have been brought in unobserved. The μετρητής is probably = the Jewish na (which, Jos. Autt. viii. 2. 9, held 72 ξ έσται = the Attic μετρητής = 8 gallons 7.4 pints), and stands for it in the LXX, ref. 2 Chron. According to this, the quantity of wine thus created would = 6 \times (2 or 3) \times (8 gallons 7.4 pints) = 6 × (between 17 and 25 gallons) = say, 6×21 gallons = 126 gallons. The large quantity thus created has been cavilled at by unbelievers. We may leave them to their cavils with just one remark,-that He who creates abundance enough in this earth to "put temptation in men's way," acted on this occasion analogously with His known method of dealing. We may answer an error on the other side (if it be on the other side), by saying, that the Lord here most effectually and once for all stamps with His condemnation that false system of moral reformation, which would commence by pledges to abstain from intoxicating liquors. He pours out His bounty for all, and He vouchsafes His grace to each for guidance; and to endeavour to evade the work which He has appointed for each man,-by refusing the bounty, to save the trouble of seeking the grace, is an attempt which must ever end in degradation of the individual motives, and in social demoralization, -whatever present apparent effects may follow its first promulgation. One visible sign of this degradation, in its intellectual form, is the miserable attempt made by some of the advocates of this movement, to shew that the wine here and in other places of Scripture is unfermented wine, not possessing the power of intoxication.

The filling with water, and drawing out wine, is all that is related. moment of the miracle," says Lücke, "is rather understood than expressed. It seems to lie between vv. 7 and 8" (i. 471). The process of it is wholly out of the region of our imagination. In order for wine to be produced, we have the growth and ripening of the grape; the crushing of it in proper vessels; the fermentation;—but here all these are in a moment brought about in their results, by the same Power which made the laws of nature, and created and unfolded the capacities of man. See below on ver. 11.

8.] The ἀρχιτρίκλινος (συμποσίαρχος, έπιμελητής του συμποσίου, Euthym.) seems to be the same with the ήγούμενος spoken of, Sir. xxxv. (xxxii.) 1, and with the Latin rex, or magister, convivii. It would seem (from Sir. l. c.) that he was one of the guests raised to the post of presiding over the arrangements of the feast. This is however doubted by the older Commentators (Severus in the Catena, Lücke, i. 472), who make him not one of the guests, but a person holding this especial office, and attending on feasts. Here, he tastes the wine; and therefore probably was a guest himself. Lücke quotes from ^m φωνεῖ τὸν ⁿ νυμφίον ὁ ^g ἀρχιτρίκλινος ¹⁰ καὶ λέγει αὐτῷ mch. i. 40 reft. natt. is. 15 ½. Petronius "triclinarches." ήντληκότες] This is the participle of the pluperf. (as well as of the perf.), and is here to be so rendered-who had drawn 10. The saving of the $d\rho\chi$. is a general one, not applicable to the company then present. We may be sure that the Lord would not have sanctioned, nor ministered to, actual drunkenness. Only those who can conceive this, will find any difficulty here; and they will find difficulties every where. The account of the practice referred to is, that the palates of men become after a while dull, and cannot distinguish between good wine and bad. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xiv. 13) speaks of persons "qui etiam convivis (vina) alia quam sibimetipsis ministrant, aut procedente mensa subjiciunt." But the practice here described is not precisely that of which Pliny speaks, nor is there any meanness to be charged on it: it is only that, when a man has some kinds of wine choicer than others, he naturally produces the choicest, to suit the most discriminating taste. With regard to the word μεθυσθώσιν, while there is no reason here to press its ordinary meaning, so neither is there any to shrink from it, as uttered by the ἀρχιτρίκλινος. The safest rendering is that of Tyndall and Cranmer, "when men be dronke;" "cum inebriati fuerint," Vulg. 11.] Without the fuerint," Vulg. article before ἀρχήν (see rec. in digest) it is This wrought Jesus as the beginning of his miracles:—ἀρχή being the predi-This assertion of John excludes all the apocryphal miracles of the Gospel of the Infancy, and such like works, from σημείον, which occasionally occurs in the other Gospels and the Acts in this absolute sense of a miracle (see reff.), is St. John's ordinary word for it. την δόξαν αύτ.] Cf. Luthardt, p. 62. The glory, namely, which is referred to in ch. i. 14, where see note. It was a miracle eminently shewing forth the glory of the λόγος, δι' οδ πάντα έγένετο, in His state of having become flesh. And this 'believing on Him,' here predicated of the disciples, was certainly a higher faith than that which first led them to Him. They obtained new insight into His power; -not yet reflectively, so as to infer what all this implied, but so as to increase their faith and trust in Him. Again and again 'they believed:' new degrees of faith being attained; just as this has since been the case, and will continue to be, in the Church, in the continual providential development of the Christian spirit,-the leavening of the whole lump by degrees. This important miracle, standing as it does at the very entrance of the official life of Christ, has been the subject of many doubts, and attempts to get rid of, or explain away, the power which was here manifested. But never did a narrative present a more stubborn inflexibility to the wresters of Scripture:-never was simple historical veracity more strikingly stamped on any miracle than on this. And doubtless this is providentially so arranged: see the objections to it treated, and some admirable concluding remarks, in Lücke, i. 478. To those who yet seek some sufficient cause for the miracle being wrought, we may-besides the conclusive answer that we are not in a position to treat this question satisfactorily, -assign the unmistakeable spiritual import of the change here made, as indicating the general nature of the beneficent work which the Lord came on earth to do. So Cornelius a Lapide (Trench, p. 113, edn. 2, note): "Christus initio suæ prædicationis mutans aquam in vinum significabat se legem Mosaicam, instar aquæ insipidam et frigidam, conversurum in Evangelium gratiæ quæ instar vini est, generosa, sapida, ardens, et efficax." Similarly Eusebius, Augustine, Bernard, and Gregory the Great. Trench, ibid.

12-IV. 54.7 FIRST MANIFESTATION OF HIMSELF AS THE SON OF GOD :- and herein, ii. 13-iii. 36, IN JERUSALEM AND JUDÆA. 12. κατέβη, because Capernaum lay on the lake,—Cana higher up the country. There is no certainty as to this visit, whether or not it is the same with that hinted at in Luke iv. 23: so that no chronological inferences can be built on the hypothesis with any Οη οἱ ἀδελφοὶ [αὐτοῦ] security. see Matt. xiii. 55 and note. the transition from His private to His public life. His mother and brethren are still with Him, attached merely by nature: His disciples, newly attached by faith. In the next verse He has cast off His mere earthly ties for His work. Also in the où πολλάς ήμ., notice less a mere chronological design, than one to shew that He lost no time after His first miracle, in publicly manifesting Himself as the Son of God.

13-22. The first official visit to Jerusalem, at a Passover: and cleansing of the Temple. 13.] No data are given to determine whether the reason of the short stay at Capernaum was the near approach of the Passover. Nothing is said of those who accompanied Jesus: but at all events, His already called disciples would be with Him (see ver. 22, and ch. iii. 22), and among them in all probability the Evangelist himself:-but not the rest of the Twelve, who were not yet called. Of this visit, the synoptic narrative records nothing. 14. On the distinctness of this cleansing from that related in Matt. xxi. 12 ff., see note there.

έν τῷ ἱερῷ] In the court of the Gentiles, the ἔξωθεν ἱερόν, as distinguished from the vads, the inner temple. This market appears to have sprung up since the captivity, with a view to the convenience of those Jews who came from a distance, to provide them with the beasts for offering, and to change their foreign money into the sacred shekel, which alone was allowed to be paid in for the temple capitation-tax (Matt. xvii. 24 ff.). This tax was sometimes, as in Matt. l. c., paid elsewhere than in Jerusalem; but generally there, and in the temple. The very fact of the market being held there would produce an unseemly mixture of sacred and profane transactions, even setting aside the abuses which would be certain to be mingled with the traffic. It is to the former of these evils that our Lord makes reference in this first cleansing; in the second, to the latter.

15.] The σχοινία were probably the rushes which were littered down for the cattle to lie on. That our Lord used the scourge on the beasts only, not on the sellers of them, is almost necessarily contained in the form of the sentence here: the $\tau \acute{a} \tau \epsilon \pi \rho \acute{b} \beta a \tau a \kappa$. τ . $\beta \acute{o} a s$ being as it stands with Te and Kai, merely epexegetical of πάντας, not conveying new particulars. So that it should be rendered as in A. V. R., "He drove all out of the temple, both the sheep and the oxen." (¿ξέχεεν is the aor., not the resolved form of the imperfect: cf. Aristoph. Nub. 75, and see Lobeck's note on Phryn. p. 222.) It has been imagined, that He dealt more mildly with those who sold the doves, which were for the offerings of the poor. But this was not so: He dealt alike with all. No other way was open with regard to them, than to order them to take their birds This cleansing of the temple was in the direct course of His manifestation as the Messiah. Immediately after the prophetic announcement of the Forerunner, Mal. iii. 1, is that of the Lord's coming suddenly to His temple, and purifying it. This act also answers (but like the fulfilment last mentioned, only in an imperfect and still prophetic sense) to the declaration of the Baptist " Whose fan is in His hand," &c., Matt. iii. 12. proceeding was not altogether unexampled nor unauthorized, even in an uncommissioned person: for all had the right to reform an abuse of this sort, and the zealots put this right in practice. The disciples by their allusion in ver. 17 seem to refer the action to this latter class.

16. τοῦ πατρός μου] The coincidence with Luke ii. 49 is remarkable. By this expression thus publicly used, our Lord openly announces His Messiahship. Nathanael had named Him 'the Son of God' with this meaning—see on ch. i. 50,—and these words, coupled with the expectation which the confession of John the Baptist would arouse, could leave no doubt on the minds of the Jews as to their import: see on ch. iii. 2. οἰκ. ἐμπ.] Not yet σπήλαιον ληστῶν, as at the end of His ministry: see above on yer. 14.

17.] ἐμνήσθησαν, at the time, not afterwards, which would have been expressed, as in ver. 22. But the very remembrance itself was prophetic. The καταφαγεῖν spoken of in that passion-Psalm, was the marring and wasting of the Saviour's frame by His zeal for God and God's Church, which resulted in the buffeting, the scourging, the Cross.

καταφάγεται is a well-known future, contracted from καταφαγήσεται: see reff. and cf. the prophecy, 4 Kings ix. 36, καταφάγονται οἱ κύνες τὰς σάρκας '1εζάβελ.

18.7 On the demand of the Jews, see Deut. xiii. 1-3. It was not only to justify His having driven out the abomination; this any one might have done;—but to justify the mission and the whole course of action which the words τοῦ πατρός μου implied. They used the same expression at the end of His ministry, Matt. xxi. 23. 19.] This answer of Matt. xxi. 23. 19. This answer of our Lord has been involved in needless difficulty. That [in uttering the words τον ναον τοῦτον] He pointed to His own Body, is inconceivable; -for thus both the Jews and His own disciples must have understood Him, which (see vv. 20, 22) neither of them did. That He implied [in saying Λύσατε τ. ν. τ.] that their lawless proceedings in the temple would at last bring it to an end, is equally inconceivable;

both on account of the latter part of His declaration, which would thus have no meaning,-and because of the use of the word vaos. - which was the holy and the holiest place, the temple itself,—as distinguished from To ispor, the whole enceinte of the sacred buildings. Stier has well remarked (i. 48, 49, edn. 2) that our Lord in this saying comprehended in the reality,-His own Body, its type and symbol,-the temple then before them. That temple, with all its ordinances and holy places, was but the shadow of the Christian Church ;-that, the type of the Body of the Lord, represented the Church, which is veritably His Body. And so the saying was fulfilled by the slaying of His actual Body, in which rejection of Him the destruction of the Jewish temple and city was involved, - and the raising of that Body after three days, in which resurrection we, all the members of His new glorified Body, are risen again. It is for want of keeping in mind this width and depth of the Lord's sayings, that so many Commentators have fallen into error here and elsewhere in interpreting them. Most of the best German expositors, e. g. Lücke, Neander (L. J. 283), and even Olshausen, find insuperable difficulty in the exposition given by the Evangelist of these words, and even contend that it could not have been the right one. But surely those who believe the Apostles to have been under the special influence of the Holy Spirit in their work of witnessing to and bringing out the truth of the sayings and doings of the Lord, cannot take this ground. It is a wholly distinct matter from a chronological inaccuracy, or a report of the same occurrence varying in minor details; such things the Spirit may have, and has as matter of fact, for special reasons per-mitted in the Evangelists; but we have here,-assumed the genuineness of our Gospel, on which none of these writers have a doubt,-the positive declaration of an Apostle (and what an Apostle) of the meaning of the Lord's saying; -which I do not think we are at liberty to question, on any, even the most moderate view, of the inspiration of the Scriptures. The difficulties attending the interpretation are,-besides the double meaning which I have treated above, -(1) the use of the imperative, as applied to the death of Christ. Olshausen contends that it must be mandatory, and cannot be hypothetical. But surely Matt. xii. 33 is an instance in point, as adduced by De Wette, for the hypothetical meaning: and usages exactly like that in our text are found in the reff. (v): see Winer, Gram. edn. 6, § 43. 2. (2) The words ἐγερῶ αὐτόν, seeing that the resurrection of the Lord is ever spoken of as the work of the Father. Yes,—but by power committed to Christ Himself: see ch. x. 18, where this is distinctly asserted; and ch. vi. 39, 40, 44, where it is implied, for He is the first-fruits of them that sleep,-and (though the whole course of His working was after the will of the Father,-and in the Spirit, which wrought in Him) strictly and truly raised Himself from the dead in the sense here intended. (3) The utterance of such a prophecy at so early a period of His official life. But it was not a prophecy known and understood,but a dark saying, from which no one could then draw an inference as to His death or resurrection. The disciples did not understand it; and I cannot agree with Stier that the Jews could have had any idea of such being His meaning. Chrys. (Hom. xxiii. in Joan. p. 134) says, πολλά τοιαθτα φθέγγεται τοις μέν τότε οὐις ὄντα δῆλα, τοῖς δὲ μετὰ ταῦτα έσόμενα, τίνος δὲ εἴνεκεν τοῦτο ποιεῖ; ἵνα δειχθῆ προειδὼς ἄνωθεν τὰ μετὰ ταῦτα, ὅταν ἐξέλθη καὶ τῆς προβρήσεως τὸ τέλος, ὁ δὴ καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς προφητείας ταύτης γέγονεν. Lücke remarks, that the circumstance of the words being spoken so long before his trial by the Sanhedrim, would make it more easy for the false witnesses to distort them. they did, but not so as to agree with one They reported it, 'I can destroy,' &c., which makes a wide difference, and represents our Lord as an enemy of the temple (Matt. xxvi. 61), and some added to τον ν. τ., -τ. χειροποίητον, and that He would raise another ἀχειροποίητον 20.] The building (Mark xiv. 58). of the temple by Herod the Great is stated by Josephus, in Antt. xv. 11. 1, to have been begun in the eighteenth year of his reign; in B. Antt. xvii. 8. 1. Reckoning from this latter, we shall have twenty years till the birth of Christ, and thirty years since that event, from which fifty, however, four must be taken, since our era is four years too late. This gives forty-six. The temple was not completed till A.D. 64, under Herod Agrippa II., and the procurator Albinus; so that ἀκοδομήθη, was in building, must refer to the greater part of the work now completed. The sense of this aor. is curiously illustrated by a passage in Ezra v. 16, τότε Σαβανασὰρ ἐκεῖνος ήλθε και έδωκε θεμελίους τοῦ οἴκου τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν Ἱερουσαλήμ, καὶ ἀπὸ τότε ἕως τοῦ

νῦν ἀκοδομήθη καὶ οὐκ ἐτελέσθη.
22.] τῆ γραφῆ, by all analogy, must mean the O. T. scriptures. That the resurrection of the Lord is the subject of O. T. prophecy, we find in several passages of the N. T., see ch. xx. 9: Luke xxiv. 26, 27: 1 Cor. xv. 4. At first sight it appears difficult to fix on any passage in which it is directly announced: but with the deeper understanding of the Scriptures which the Holy Spirit gave the Apostles and still gives the Christian Church, such prophecies as that in Ps. xvi. are recognized as belonging to Him in Whom alone they are properly fulfilled: see also Hosea vi. 2.

What miracles these were, is not related :-- certainly some notable ones, see The mention of them precludes us from understanding ch. iv. 54, as indicating that the healing of the ruler's son was absolutely His second miracle.

24, 25.] The repetition of ἐπίστ. has been regarded (Lücke, De Wette) as a sort of play on the word. But I should rather set it down to the simplicity of The meaning is, He did John's style. not trust himself to them, -i.e. treat them as true and earnest disciples: they entered into no spiritual relation with Him, and He in consequence into none with them. The fact of this being narrated shews that it made an impression on the Evangelist, and led him perhaps first to the conclusion which he here expresses, and which higher knowledge enabled him afterwards to place, as he here does, on its right ground :- His knowing what was in man. Nothing less than divine knowledge is here set forth; the words are even

CHAP. III. 1-21.] The Lord's discourse with Nicodemus,—one of these believers on account of His Miracleson the spiritual nature of the kingdom of God and the necessity of the new birth. 1.] We have in the Talmud (see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in loc.) a Nicodemus ben Gorion, who was properly called Bonai, and said to have been a disciple of Jesus: but he is found living at the destruction of Jerusalem. This might certainly have been; still it must be quite uncertain whether he be the same with this Nicodemus.

He is mentioned again ch. vii. 50; xix. 39. He was a member of the Sanhedrim (αρχων, see reff.), and, besides, a νομοδιδάσκαλος (ver. 10). 2.] νυκτόςfor fear of the Jews: see ch. xii. 42. The discourse seems to have taken place between Jesus and Nicodemus alone,-and may have been related by our Lord to the Evangelist afterwards. If this be deemed improbable (though I do not see why it should), -of the two other alternatives I would rather believe that John was present, than that Nicodemus should have so minutely related a conversation which in his then position he could not understand.

οίδαμεν This plural may be merely an allusion to others who had come to the same conclusion, e.g. Joseph of Arimathea; or it may express that Nicodemus was sent in the name of several who wished to know the real character of this Person who wrought such miracles. It is harsh, in this private conversation, to take the plural as merely of singular import, as Lightfoot seems to do. His other rendering, "vulgo agnoscitur," is better,—but not satisfactory; for the common people did not generally confess it, and Nicodemus, as an ἄρχων, would not be likely to speak in their name (see ch. vii. 49). I would rather take it to express the true conviction respecting Jesus, of that class to which Nicodemus belonged—the ἄρχοντες: and see in it an important fact, that their persecutions and murder of the Prince of Life hence found their greatest aggravation, that they were carried on against the conclusions of their own minds, out of bitter malice, and worldly disappointment at His humble and unobtrusive character, and the spiritual purity and self-sacrifice which He inculcated. Still this must not, though undoubtedly it has truth in it, be carried too far: cf. Acts iii. 17 note, and Acts xiii. 27: 1 Cor. ii. 8. Some degree of ignorance there must necessarily have been in all of them, even Caiaphas included, of our Lord's Office and Person. Stier (iv. 11 ff., edn. 2) seems to think that Nicodemus, by using the plural, is sheltering himself from expressing his own conviction, so as to be able to draw back ἐλήλυθας Stier again if necessary. (and Schleiermacher, cited by Stier, iv. 12, edn. 2, note) thinks that there is involved in this word a recognition by Nicodemus of the Messianic mission of Jesus: -that it expresses His being δ έρχόμενος (Matt. xi. 3 al.). It is never used of any but the Messiah, except by the Lord Himself, when speaking of John the Baptist as the subject of prophecy (see διδάσκαλος In Matt. xi. 14 al.). this and the following words, Nicodemus seems to be cautiously withdrawing from his admission being taken as expressing too much. For who of the Jews ever expected a teacher to come from God? They looked for a King, to sit on David's throne,-a Prophet, to declare the divine will; -but the Messiah was never designated as a mere teacher, till the days of modern Socinianism. So that he seems trying to qualify or recall his ἐλήλυθας by this ad-The following words exhibit the same cautious inconsistency. No one F $\cdots \epsilon \iota \pi \epsilon \nu$ can do, &c. unless-we expect some strong expression of the truth, such as we had from Nathanael in ch. i. 50, but the sentence drops to merely- God be with him, which is a very poor and insufficient exponent of ἀπὸ θ. ἐλήλυθας. Against this inconsistency,-the inner knowledge that the Kingdom of God was come, and He who was to found it, on the one hand,and the rationalizing endeavour to reduce this heavenly kingdom to mere learning, and its Founder to a mere teacher, on the other,-is the following discourse directed.

3. We are not to imagine that any thing is wanting to complete the sense or connexion. Our Lord replies, It is not learning, but life, that is wanted for the Messiah's Kingdom; and life must begin by birth. Luther (Stier, iv. 17, edn. 2) says: "My teaching is not of doing and leaving undone, but of a change in the man (nicht von Thun und Laffen, fondern von Merben); -so that it is, not new works done, but a new man to do them; not another life only, but another birth." And only by this means can Nicodemus gain the teaching for which he is come, -ibeiv τ. β. τ. θ.,—'become a disciple of Christ:' -ἴδοι. τουτέστι νοήσοι, Thl.,—'understand, by sharing'—' have any conception of.' ἄνωθεν — οἱ μὲν "ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ" φασιν, οἱ δὲ "ἔξ ἀρχῆς." Chr.,—who, as also Euthym., explains γεν. ανωθ. by παλιγγενεσία: Orig., Cyr., and Thl. taking the other meaning. The true meaning is to be found by taking into account the answer of Nicodemus, who obviously understood it of a new birth in mature life. Born afresh would be a better rendering than 'born again,' being closer to the meaning of ἄνωθεν, 'from the very beginning;'—'unless a man begin his life anew altogether (πάλιν ἄνωθεν, Gal. iv. 9), he cannot' &c. It is not impossible that the other meaning may lie beneath this,—as the βασιλεία is του θεου. and so must the birth be; -but Grotius has remarked that in Hebrew and Aramaic (in one of which languages our Lord, discoursing with a Rabbinical Jew, probably spoke) there is no word of double meaning corresponding to ἄνωθεν:-so that He must have expressed it, as Nicodemus understood it, of an entirely new birth. That John never uses the word elsewhere in this sense (Lücke) is here of little weight, for he uses it only three times more, and never with a verb cognate to γεννάομαι. The Evangelist most likely chose the Greek expression γεν. ανωθ. as strictly corresponding to the term avayevνασθαι, which, when he wrote, was in common use in the Church: see 1 Pet. i. 3, 23. Justin Martyr, as Bp. Wordsworth reminds us, quotes as our Lord's saying, Apol. i. 61, p. 79, αν μη αναγεννήθητε, οὐ μη εἰς έλθητε εἰς τ. βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν: probably mixing this with Matt. xviii. 3. On the birth itself, see below, ver. 5.

4.7 It is impossible that Nicodemus can have so entirely and stupidly misunderstood our Lord's words, as his question here would seem to imply. The idea of new birth was by no means alien from the Rabbinical views. They described a proselyte when baptized as "sicut parvulus jam natus." Lightfoot in loc. I agree with Stier in thinking that there was something of the spirit that would not understand, and the disposition to turn to ridicule what he heard. But together with this there was also considerable real ignorance. The proselyte might be regarded as born again, when he became one of the seed of Abraham: this figure would be easily explained on the Judaical view: but that every man should need this, was beyond Nicodemus's comprehension. He u " ek, ch. i. Neb. xi. 35.

therefore rebuts the assertion with a reductio ad absurdum, which in spirit expresses, as in ch. vi. 60,- 'This is an hard saying; who can hear it?' γέρων ων Probably he himself was old, and he instances his own case. Our Lord passes by the question of Nicodemus without notice, further than that this His second assertion takes as it were the ground from under it, by explaining the token and means of the new birth. There can be no doubt, on any honest interpretation of the words, that γεννηθήναι έξ ύδατος refers to the token or outward sign of baptism, - γ. ἐκ πνεύματος to the thing signified, or inward grace of the Holy Spirit. All attempts to get rid of these two plain facts have sprung from doctrinal prejudices, by which the views of expositors have been warped. Such we have in Calvin: "spiritum, qui nos repurgat, et qui virtute sua in nos diffusa vigorem inspirat cœlestis vitæ;"-Grotius: "spiritum aquæ instar emundantem;"—Cocceius: "gratiam Dei, sordes et vitia abluentem;"—Lampe: "obedientiam Christi;"-Tholuck, who holds that not Baptism itself, but only its idea, that of cleansing, is referred to;—and others, who endeavour to resolve ὕδατος καὶ πνεύματος into a figure of ἐν διὰ δυοῖν, so as to make it mean 'the cleansing or purifying Spirit.' All the better and deeper expositors have recognized the coexistence of the two, water and the Spirit. So for the most part the ancients: so Lücke (in his last edition), De Wette, Neander, Stier, Olshausen, &c. being then recognized, to what does ύδωρ refer? At that time, two kinds of baptism were known: that of the proselytes, by which they were received into Judaism, -and that of John, by which, as a preparatory rite, symbolizing repentance, the people were made ready for Him who was to baptize them with the Holy Ghost. But both these were significant of one and the same truth; that namely of the entire cleansing of the man for the new and spiritual life on which he was to enter, symbolized by water cleansing the outward person. Both were appointed means,—the one by the Jewish Church,— the other, stamping that first with approval, by God Himself,—towards their respective ends. John himself declared his baptism to be incomplete, -it was only with water; One was coming, who should baptize with the Holy Ghost. That declaration of his is the key to the understanding of this verse. Baptism, complete, with water and the Spirit, is the admission into the kingdom of God. Those who have received the outward sign and the spiritual grace, have entered into that Kingdom. And this entrance was fully ministered to the disciples when the Spirit descended on them on the day of Pentecost. So that, as spoken to Nicodemus, these words referred him to the baptism of John, which probably (see Luke vii. 30) he had slighted. But they were not only spoken to him. The words of our Lord have in them life and meaning for all ages of His Church: and more especially these opening declarations of His ministry. He here unites together the two elements of a complete Baptism which were sundered in the words of the Baptist, ch. i. 33-in which united form He afterwards (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20: Mark xvi. 16) ordained it as a Sacrament of His Church. Here He speaks of spiritual Baptism, as in ch. vi. of spiritual Communion, and in both places in connexion with the outward conditions and media of these sacraments. It is observable that here, as ordinarily (with a special exception, Acts x. 44 ff.), the outward sign comes first, and then the spiritual grace, vouchsafed in and by means of it where duly received. eisedbeiv eis is more than $i\delta\epsilon\hat{\imath}\nu$ above, though no stress is to be laid on the difference. The former word was perhaps used because of Nicodemus's expectation of teaching being all that was required: but now, the necessity of a real vital change having been set forth, the expression is changed to a practical one the entering into the Kingdom of God.

6. The neuter denotes not only the universal application of this truth, but (see Luke i. 35) the very first beginnings of life in the embryo, before sex can be predicated. So Bengel: "notat ipsa prima stamina vitæ." The Lord here answers Nicodemus's hypothetical question υημένον ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος πνεῦμά ἐστιν. 7 μὴ x θαυμάσης x w. 5 τι, 4 τιν σοι y Δεῖ ὑμᾶς o γεννηθῆναι z ἄνωθεν. 8 τὸ 6 Λτις, 1 Τὸ 5 1 1 1 1 1 8 1 of ver. 4, by telling him that even could it be so, it would not accomplish the birth of which He speaks. In this σάρξ is included every part of that which is born after the ordinary method of generation: even the spirit of man, which, receptive as it is of the Spirit of God, is yet in the natural birth dead, sunk in trespasses and sins, and in a state of wrath. Such 'flesh and blood 'cannot inherit the Kingdom of God, 1 Cor. xv. 50. But when the man is born again of the Spirit (the water does not appear any more, being merely the outward form of reception,-the less included in the greater), then just as flesh generates flesh, so spirit generates spirit, after its own image, see 2 Cor. iii. 18 fin.; and since the Kingdom of God is a spiritual kingdom, such only who are so born can enter into 7.7 The weightiest word here is upas. The Lord did not, could not, say this of Himself. Why?-Because in the full sense in which the flesh is incapacitated from entering the kingdom of God, He was not born of the flesh. He inherited the weakness of the flesh, but His spirit was not, like that of sinful man, alien from holiness and God; and therefore on Him no second birth passed; when the Holy Spirit descended on Him at His baptism. the words spoken by the Father were indicative of past approval, not of renewal. His obedience was accepted as perfect, and the good pleasure of the Father rested on Him. Therefore He includes not Himself in this necessity for the new birth.

The μὴ θαυμάσης applies to the next verse, in which Nicodemus is told that he has things as wonderful around him every day in the natural world.

8.] Our Lord might have chosen any of the mysteries of nature to illustrate the point:—He takes that one, which is above others symbolic of the action of the Spirit, and (which in both languages, that in which He spoke, as well as that in which His speech is reported) is expressed by the same word as it. So that the words as they stand apply themselves at once to the Spirit and His working, without any figure ; - spiritus ubi vult spirat. Bengel, after Origen and Augustine, takes τὸ πν. of the Holy Spirit exclusively: but this can hardly be. The form of the sentence, as well as its import, is against it. The πνεῖ, ἀκούεις, οἶδας, are all said of well-known facts. And the comparison would not hold on that supposition- 'As the Spirit is in His working on those born of Him, so is every one that is born of the Spirit.' But on the other interpretation, we have The wind breatheth, &c .: - so is, i. e. 'so it is with' (see a similar construc-tion Matt. xiii. 45) every one born of the Spirit. Notice it is not δ ἄνεμος here, but τὸ πνεῦμα, the gentle breath of the wind; -and it is heard, not felt; -a case in which the our oldas K.T.A. is more applicable than in that of a violent wind steadily blowing. It is one of those sudden breezes springing up on a calm day, which has no apparent direction, but we hear it rustling in the leaves around. ὅπου θέλει, in the application, implies the freedom (2 Cor. iii. 17) and unrestrained working of the Spirit (1 Cor. xii. 11). πας ό γεγ.] Our Lord can hardly, as Stier explains (iv. 48, edn. 2), mean Himself by these words; or, if He does, only inclusively, as being γεγ. ἐκ τ. πv.,-not principally. He describes the mystery of the spiritual life: we see its effects, in ourselves, and others who have it; but we cannot trace its beginnings, nor can we prescribe to the Holy Spirit His course: He works in us and leads us on, accompanying us with His witness,-His voice, spiritually discerned. " Homo in quo spiritus spirat, e spiritu respirat."

Bengel. This saying of the Lord—in contradiction to all so-called Methodism, which prescribes the time and manner of the working of the Spirit-assures us of the manifold and undefinable variety of both these. "The physiognomies of those who are born again, are as various as those of natural men" (Dräseke, cited by Stier, iv. 50, edn. 2).

9.] The question of iv. 50, edn. 2). 9.] The question of Nicodemus is evidently still one of unf = here only, see James v. 6. τοῦ Ἰσραήλ, καὶ ταῦτα οὐ γινώσκεις; 11 ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω 8 Τησοῦς καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ 8 Σὲ εἶ 6 ό διδάσκαλος ΑΒΕΘ ΗΚΕΜ τοῦ Ἰσραήλ, καὶ ταῦτα οὐ γινώσκεις; 11 ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω 8 Τημεν τοῦ ἴσραήλ, καὶ ταῦτα οὐ γινώσκεις; 11 ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω 8 Τημεν σοι ὅτι ὁ οἴδαμεν λαλοῦμεν καὶ ὁ ἐωράκαμεν μαρτυροῦμεν, 1 Λλ113 τοι ὅτι οι ὅτι ὁ οἴδαμεν λαλοῦμεν καὶ ὁ ἐωράκαμεν μαρτυροῦμεν, 1 Λλ113 καὶ τὴν 8 μαρτυρίαν ἡμῶν οὐ 8 Ηλαμβάνετε. 12 εἶ τὰ ἱ ἐπίγεια τὰ ἱτὰν ὑμῖν τὰ τὰ ὑπὶν τὰ ὑπὶν τὰ ὑπὶν τὰ ὑπὶν τὰ ὑπὸν οὐρανίνα πιστεύσετε; 13 καὶ οὐδεὶς 8 ἀναβέβηκεν εἰς τὸν οὐρανούν, εἶ μὴ ὁ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ 8 καταβάς, ὁ 1 νίὸς οπὶς. belief, though no longer of frivolity: see 10.7 I believe the E. V. is right in rendering & Sid. a master; the article is inserted as required by Too before 'Ισραήλ, which is expressed as giving a solemnity to 'Iσρ. as the people of God. Or is it possible that ὁ διδάσκαλος may merely be meant as one of οι διδάσκαλοι? I prefer either of these reasons for the presence of the article, to supposing it to have any emphatic meaning. Nicodemus was manifestly in no supereminent place among the ἄρχοντες: see ch. vii. 50-52. Still less can I with Bp. Middleton, Gr. Art. pp. 242 3, believe any blame conveyed in the title. [Dean Alford afterwards preferred rendering δ διδάσκαλος the teacher; see N. T. for English Readers, and N. T. Authorized Version Revised.]

11.7 Henceforward the discourse is an answer to the unbelief, and in answering that, to the question (mas δύν. 7. yev.) of Nicodemus: by shewing him the appointed means of this new birth, and of being upheld in the life to which it is the entrance, viz. faith in the Son of God. δοίδαμεν λ. . . .] Why these plurals? Various interpretations have been given: ή περί έαυτοῦ καὶ τοῦ πατρὸς τοῦτό φησιν, ἡ περὶ ἐαυτοῦ μόνου (Euthym.);—"Loquitur de se et de Spiritu" (Bengel); -of Himself and the Prophets (Beza, Tholuck); - of Himself and John the Baptist (Knapp);—of Teachers like Himself (Meyer);—of all the born of the Spirit (Lange, Wesley);—of the three Persons in the Holy Trinity (Stier);—or, the plural is only rhetorical (Lücke, De Wette). I had rather take it as a proverbial saying; q.d. 'I am one of those who,' &c. Our Lord thereby brings out the unreasonableness of that unbelief which would not receive His witness, but made it an exception to the general proverbial οὐ λαμβάνετε, addressed still to Nicodemus, and through him to the Jews: not to certain others who were present, as Olsh. supposes. 12.7 The words μαρτυρίαν λαμβάνειν prepared the way for the new idea which is brought forward in this verse-πιστεύειν. Faith is, in the most pregnant sense, 'the receiving of testimony;' because it is the making subjectively real the contents of that testimony. So the πιστεύειν είς αὐτόν [see ver. 15] is, the full reception of the Lord's testimony; because the burden of that testimony is, grace and truth and salvation by Himself. This faith is neither reasoning, nor knowledge, but a reception of divine Truth declared by One who came from God; and so it is far above reasoning and knowledge: -πιστεύομεν above But what are the enigera? οίδαμεν. That the parable about the wind is not intended, is evident from κ. οὐ πιστεύετε, which in that case would be 'do not understand.' And the emoupavia are the things of which the discourse goes on to treat from this point: viz. the heavenly side of the new birth and salvation of man, in the eternal counsels of God regarding His only-begotten Son. Stier supposes a reference in this verse to in, came down from, heaven,-and was in heaven (heaven about Him, heaven dwelling on earth, ch. i. 52), while here, and ascended up into heaven when He left this earth; -and by all these proofs, speaking in the prophetic language of accomplished Redemption, does the Lord establish, that He alone can speak of Tà έποιράνια to men, or convey the blessing of the new birth to them. Be it remembered, that He is here speaking proleptically, of results of His course and sufferings on earth,-of the way of regeneration and . salvation which God has appointed by Him. He regards therefore throughout the passage, the great facts of redemption as accomplished, and makes announcements which could not be literally acted upon till they had been so accomplished. See vv. 14 ff., whose sense will be altogether lost, unless this avaßeBnker be understood of His exaltation to be a Prince and a ὁ ῶν ἐν τῷ οὐρ.] See ch. i. 18 and note. Doubtless the meaning involves 'whose place is in heaven;' but it also asserts the being in heaven of the time then present: see ch. i. 52. Stier (iv. 68, edn. 2) speaks well of the majestic ὁ ὢν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, by which the Lord characterizes His whole life in the flesh between the καταβαίνειν and the αναβαίνειν. As uniting in Himself God, whose dwelling is heaven, with man whose dwelling is on earth, He ever was in heaven. And nearly connected with this fact is the transition to His being the fountain of cternal life, in vv. 14 ff.: cf. 1 Cor. xv. 47—50, where the same connexion is strikingly set forth.

To explain such expressions as αναβαίνειν είς τ. ούρ., &c., as mere Hebrew metaphors (Lücke, De Wette, &c.) is no more than saying that Hebrew metaphors were founded on deep insight into divine truth :- these words in fact express the truths on which Hebrew metaphors were constructed. Socious is quite right, when he says that those who take avaß. eis T. ov. metaphorically, must in all consistency take δ καταβάς έκ τ. οὺρ. metaphorically also; "qualis descensus, talis etiam ascensus." 14.] From this point the discourse passes to the Person of Christ, and Redemption by His The Lord brings before this doctor of the Law the mention of Moses, who in his day by divine command lifted up a symbol of forgiveness and redemption to Israel. Kaθώs] We must avoid all such ideas as that our Lord merely compares His death to the elevation of the brazen serpent, as if only a fortuitous likeness were laid hold of by Him. This would leave the brazen serpent itself meaningless, and is an explanation which can only satisfy those who do not discern the typical reference of all the ceremonial dispensation It is an important to the Redeemer. duty of an expositor here, to defend the obvious and only honest explanation of this comparison against the tortuous and inadequate interpretations of modern critics. The comparison lies between the exalted serpent of brass, and the exalted Son of Man. The brazen serpent sets forth the Redeemer. This by recent Commentators (Lücke, De Wette, and others) is considered impossible: and the tertium comparationis is held to be only 'the lifting up.' But this does not satisfy the construction of the comparison. 'The brazen serpent was lifted up: every one who looked on it, lived,' = 'The Son of Man must be lifted up: every one who believes on Him, shall live.' The same thing is predicated of the two; -both are lifted up; cognate consequences follow,-bodyhealing and soul-healing (as Erskine, On the Brazen Serpent). There must then be some reason why the only two members of the comparison yet unaccounted for stand where they do,-considering that the brazen serpent was lifted up not for any physical efficacy, but by command of God alone. Now on examination we find this correspondence fully established. The 'serpent' is in Scripture symbolism, the devil,-from the historical temptation in Gen. iii. downwards. But why is the devil set forth by the serpent? How does the bite of the serpent operate? It pervades with its poison the frame of its victim: that frame becomes poisoned:and death ensues. So sin, the poison of the devil, being instilled into our nature, poisoned nature, -a flesh of sin. Now the brazen serpent was made in the likeness of the serpents which had bitten them. It represented to the children of Israel the poison which had gone through their frames, and it was hung up there on the banner-staff, as a trophy, to shew them that for the poison, there was healing; -that the plague had been overcome. In it, there was no poison; only the likeness of it. Now was not the Lord Jesus made èv δμοιώματι σαρκός άμαρτίας, Rom. viii. 3? Was not He made 'Sin for us, who knew no sin' (2 Cor. v. 21)? Did not He, on His Cross, make an open shew of, and triumph over, the Enemy, so that it was as if the Enemy himself had been nailed to that Cross (Col. ii. 15)? Were not Sin and Death and Satan crucified, when He was crucified ? ἐκεῖ μέν, ἐπεὶ δι' ὄφεως ἡ βλάβη, δι' όφεως καὶ ή θεραπεία ένταῦθα δέ, ἐπεὶ δι' ἀνθρώπου ὁ θάνατος εἰςῆλθεν εἰς τὸν κόσμον, δι' ανθρώπου και ή ζωή παρεγένετο, Euthym. δει, it is necessary, in the Father's counsel-it is decreed, but not arbitrarily :-- the very necessity of things, which is in fact but the evolution of the divine Will, made it requisite that the pure and sinless Son of Man should thus be uplifted and suffer: see Luke xxiv. ὑψωθῆναι] In this word there is more than the mere crucifixion. It has respect in its double meaning (of which see a remarkable instance in Gen. xl. 13, 19, E. V.) to the exaltation of the Lord on the Cross, and through the Cross to His Kingdom; and refers back to avaßéβηκεν είς τ. ούρ. before. Stier quotes the Christian proverb, 'Crux scala cæli.' 15.] The corresponding clause applying to the type is left to be supplied-'And as every one who looked on it was healed, πιστ. έν αὐτώ This expression, here only used by John, implies His exaltation, - see ch. xii. 32. It is a belief in (abiding in, see note on ver. 18) His Person being what God by His sufferings and exaltation hath made Him to be, and being that to ME. This involves, on the part of the believer, the

See on this verse the remarkable passage, Wisd. xvi. 5-13, where as much of the healing sign is opened as could be expected before the great Antitype Himself appeared. 16.] Many Commentators—since the time of Erasmus, who first suggested the notion-have maintained that the discourse of our Lord breaks off here, and the rest, to ver. 21, consists of the remarks of the Evangelist. (So Tholuck, Olshausen, Lücke, De Wette; which last attributes vv. 13, 14 also to John.) But to those who view these discourses of our Lord as intimately connected wholes, this will be as inconceivable, as the idea of St. Matthew having combined into one the insulated sayings of his Master. This discourse would be altogether fragmentary, and would have left Nicodemus almost where he was before, had not this most weighty concluding part been also spoken to him. This it is, which expands and explains the assertions of vv. 14, 15, and applies them to the present life and conduct of mankind. The principal grounds alleged for supposing the discourse to break off here seem to be (a) that all allusion to Nicodemus is henceforth dropped. But this is not conclusive, for it is obvious that the natural progress of such an interview on his part would be from questioning to listening: and that even had he joined in the dialogue, the Evangelist would not have been bound to relate all his remarks, but only those which, as vv. 2, 4 and 9, were important to bring out his mind and standing-point. henceforth past tenses are used; making it more probable that the passage was added after the great events alluded to had taken place. But does not our Lord speak here, as in so many other cases, proleptically, of the fulness of the accomplishment of those designs, which in the divine counsels were accomplished? Is not this way of speaking natural to a discourse which is treating of the development of the new birth, itself not yet brought in till the Spirit was given? See a parallel instance, with the Evangelist's explanation, ch. vii. 37-39. (γ) On account of this use of μονογενής, vv. 16, 18, which is peculiar to John. But, as Stier well enquires (iv. 84, edn. 2), whence did John get this word, but from the lips of his Divine Master? Would he have ventured on such an expression, except by an authorization from Him? (8) It is asserted that John often continues our Lord's discourses with additions of his own;—and ver. 31, and ch. i. 16, are alleged as instances. Of these, ch. i. 16 is beside the question; -for the whole prologue is spoken in the person of the Evangelist, and the Baptist's testimony in ver. 15 is merely confirmatory of ver. 14, and then the connexion goes on with ver. 16. On the untenableness of the view with regard to vv. 31 ff., see notes there.

It would besides give us a very mean idea of the honesty or reverence of one who sets forth so sublime a view of the Divinity and Authority of our Lord, to suppose him capable, in any place, of attributing to his Master words and sentiments of his own invention. And that the charge amounts to this, every simple reader can bear testimony. The obvious intention of the Evangelist here is, that the Lord shall have said these words. If our Lord did not say them, but the Evangelist, we cannot stop with the view that he has added his own remarks to our Lord's discourse, but must at once pronounce him guilty of an imposture and a forgery. (See Stier, iv. 81 ff., edn. 2.) I conclude therefore on all these grounds that the words following, to

ver. 21, cannot be otherwise regarded than as uttered by our Lord in continuation of His discourse. ἠγάπησεν] The indefinite signifying the universal and eternal existence of that love which God Himself is (1 John iv. 8). Hov. the world, in the most general sense, as represented by, and included in, man,-Gen. iii. 17, 18, and i. 28; - not, the elect, which would utterly destroy the force of the passage: see on ver. 18. Lord here reveals Love as the one ground of the divine counsel in redemption, -salvation of men, as its one purpose with reτὸν υἱὸν . . . ἔδωκεν] gard to them. These words, whether spoken in Hebrew or in Greek, seem to carry a reference to the offering of Isaac; and Nicodemus in that case would at once be reminded by them of the love there required, the substitution there made, and the prophecy there uttered to Abraham, to which ίνα πας ὁ πιστ. so nearly corresponds. έδωκεν-absolute, not merely τῷ κόσμω—gave up,—παρέδωκεν,-Rom. viii. 32; where as Stier remarks, we have again, in the οὐκ ἐφείσατο, an unmistakeable allusion to the oùk ἐφείσω, said to Abraham, Gen. xxii. 16.

Tva . . .] By the repetition of this final clause verbatim from ver. 15, we have the identity of the former clauses established: i. e. the uplifting of the Son of Man like the serpent in the wilderness is the manifestation of the Divine Love in the gift of the Son of God:— δ uibs $\tau o\bar{v}$ $a\nu\theta\rho\omega\pi\sigma\nu$ of ver. 14, = in the strictest sense. δ uibs $a\nu\tau$, δ $\mu\nu\rho\rho\gamma$, of ver. 16.

ανθρώπου of ver. 14, = in the strictest sense, δ νίδο αὐτ. δ μονογ. of ver. 16. 17.] The κόσμος,—the Gentile world,—was according to Jewish ideas to be judged and condemned by the Messiah. This error our Lord here removes. The assertion ch. ix. 39, εἰς κρῖμα ἐγὰ εἰς τ. κόσ. τοῦτ. ἦλθυν, is no contradiction to this. The κρῖμα there, as here, results from the separation of mankind into two classes,—those who will and those who will not come to the light; and that result itself is not the purpose why the Son of God came into the world, but is evolved in the accomplishment of the higher purpose, viz. Love, and the salvation of men. Observe, the latter clause does not correspond to the former—it is not ໃνα σώζη τὸν κόσμον,— but ἴνα σωθη ὁ κόσμος δι' αὐτοῦ:—the free will of the Kóouos is by this strikingly set forth, in connexion with vv. 19, 20. Not that the Lord is not the σωτήρ τοῦ κόσμου (ch. iv. 42), but that the peculiar cast of this passage required the other side of the truth to be brought out. πιστ. είς αὐτ. (which is John's usual phrase) the remarks above on ver. 15 apply with little distinction; els giving more the direction of the belief towards, and its resting upon, evits abiding in, Jesus as the Saviour. οὐ κρίνεται] See ch. v. 24, where the same assertion is made more fully; and note there. ήδη κέκριται, implying,-by no positive act of judgment of mine,-but by the very nature of things themselves. God has provided a remedy for the deadly bite of sin; this remedy the man has not accepted, not taken: he must then perish in his sins: he is already μη πεπίσjudged and sentenced. TEUKEV The perfect implies more than 'that faith is a definite act in time' (Lücke, De Wette); it sets before us the deliberate choice of the man, q. d. 'he hath not chosen to believe' (Lange, in Stier, iv. 93, edn. 2): see 2 Thess. ii. 11, cis τὸ ὄν., not without meaning : that name was 'Ιησούς, αὐτὸς γὰρ σώσει τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν αὐτῶν, The μονογενους also here sets before us the hopelessness of such a man's state: he has no other Saviour. 19.] The particular nature of this decided judgment is now set forth, -that the Light (see ch. i. 4, 5, 7, and notes) is come into the world (έλήλυθεν, in reference perhaps to ἐλήλυθαs, ver. 2), and men (= δ κόσμος, men in general; an awful revelation of the future reception of the Gospel) loved (the perversion of the affections and will is the deepest ruin of mankind) the darkness (see note on ch. i. 5; = the state of sin and unbelief) rather than (not = 'and not,' but as Bengel says, "Amabilitas lucis eos perculit, sed obhæserunt in amore tenebrarum," see ch. v. 35; xii. 43: 2 Tim. iii. 4) the light, because their deeds were evil (their habits, thoughts, practices,-all these are included,—were perverted). σαν and ην are the indefinite aorists, implying the general usage and state of men. when and after the $\phi \hat{\omega} s \epsilon \lambda \dot{\eta} \lambda \upsilon \theta \epsilon \nu \epsilon i s \tau$. 20. This verse analyses the psychological grounds of the preceding. The $\phi \hat{\omega}_s$ is not here 'the common light of day,' nor light in general: but as before, the Light; i. e. the Lord Jesus, and His salvation: see ver. 21 fin. There is here a difference between φαῦλα πράσσειν, and ποιείν την αλήθειαν, which is too remarkable to be passed over,—especially as the same distinction is observed in ch. v. 29,-οί τὰ ἀγαθὰ ποιήσαντες είς ἀνάστασιν ζωης, οί δὲ τὰ φαῦλα πράξαντες els αν. κρίσεως. Bengel, who noticed this, hardly I think gives the right reason for it: "malitia est irrequieta, est quiddam operosius quam veritas;" nor does Stier fully reach it, "that πράσ. signifies more a subordination, a being the servants of sin, ἐργάται ἀδικίας, Luke xiii. 27." I think the distinction is rather perhaps this,that πράσσειν is more the habit of action; so that we might say 'he that practises evil; but moieiv the true doing of good, good fruit, good that remains. He who πράσσει, has nothing but his πραγμα, which is an event, a thing of the past, a source to him only of condemnation, for he has nothing to shew for it, for it is also φαῦλον, worthless: whereas he that ποιεί, has his $\pi o i \eta \mu \alpha$,—he has abiding fruit; his works do follow him. So that the expressions will not perhaps here admit of being interchanged. (See however Rom. vii. 15-20, where the two verbs are certainly interchanged more than once.) There may possibly be a hint [in the mention of σκότος ver. 19] at the coming by night of Nicodemus, but surely only by a distant implication. He might gather this from what was said, that it would have been better for him to make open confession of Jesus; but we can hardly say that our Lord reproves him for coming even as he did. 21.7 Who is this ποιῶν τ. ἀλήθ.? the end of ch. i. will best explain to us, - ἐν & δόλος οὐκ ἔστιν, see also Luke viii. 15, and Ps. xv. The πράσσων πονηρά is crooked and perverse; he has a light, which he does not follow; he knows the light, and avoids it; and so there is no truth, singleness, in him; he is a man at variance with himself. But the simple and single-minded is he who knowing and approving the light, comes to it; and comes that he may be carried onward in this spirit of truth and single-mindedness to higher degrees of communion with and likeness to God. "The good man seeks the light, and to place his works in the light, not from a vain love of praise, but from a desire for communion wherein he finds strength and security," De Wette. But this is not all: the manifesting his works, that they are wrought in God, is and can be only by the candle of the Lord being kindled within him, and he himself born again in the Kingdom of God: see Ps. cxxxix. 23, 24.

We hear nothing of the effect produced on Nicodemus by this interview.

It certainly did not alienate him from Jesus, see ch. vii. 50; xix. 39, also ch. xii. 42. "It speaks for the simplicity and historic truthfulness of our Evangelist, that he adds nothing more, and even leaves untold the immediate result which the discourse had." (Baumgarten-Crusius, in Stier, iv. 102, edn. 2.)

23.] The situation of these places is uncertain. Eusebius and Jerome place Salim eight Roman miles south of Scythopolis, and Enon at the same distance, on the Jordan. If Scythopolis was the ancient Bethshan, both places were in Samaria: and to this agree Epiphanius and the Samaritan chronicle called Abul Phatach. In Judith iv. 4, we find mention of & αὐλών Σαλήμ in Samaria (see note on Heb. vii. 1). were West of the Jordan: see ver. 26, and compare ch. i. 28. παρεγ. κ. ἐβ., i. c. the multitudes. 24.] There is much difficulty, which probably never will be cleared up, about the date of the imprisonment of John, and its reference to the course of our Lord's ministry. Between Matt. iv. 11 and 12, there seems to be a wide hiatus, in which (see note there) the first chapters of this Gospel should be inserted. But the records from which the three synoptic Gospels have arisen were apparently unconscious of any such interval. Our Evangelist seems here to refer to such records, and to insert this remark, that it might not be imagined, as it would be from them, that our Lord's public ministry (in the wider sense, see below on ver. 26) began with the imprisonment of the Bap-25. The circumstances under which this dispute arose seem to have been these :- John and our Lord were baptizing near to one another. (On the relation of their baptisms, see below on ver. 26.) They were both watched jealously (see ch. iv. 1) by the Pharisees. One of these ('loudaios, i. e. 'loud. Tis) appears to have entered into dispute with the disciples of John about the relative importance of the two baptisms; they perhaps maintaining that their master's καθαρισμός preparatory to the Messiah was absolutely necessary for all, and he (the 'lovbaios) pointing out to them the apparent inconsistency of this Messiah himself authorizing a baptism in his name, and alleging that if so, their master's baptism was rendered superfluous. We are driven to these conjectures, because the text gives us no further insight into the fact than what the circumstances and the answer of John render probable.

26.] Compare ch. i. 28. Not, probably, any who had been baptized already by John; but multitudes of persons. The baptism now carried on by the disciples appears to have stood very much in the same position as that of John. It was preparatory to the public ministry of our Lord properly so called, which began in Galilee after the imprisonment of John. It was not accompanied with the gift of the Spirit, see ch. vii. 39. As John's commission was now on the wane, so our Lord's was expanding. The solemn cleansing of the temple was its opening; and now it is proceeding onwards, gathering multitudes around it (see ch. iv. 1).

27.] The subject of this answer is,-the divinely appointed humiliation and eclipsing of the Baptist himself before the greater majesty of Him who was come after him. Accordingly he begins in this verse by answering to the zeal of his disciples, 'that he cannot go beyond the bounds of his heaven-appointed mission.' "Non possum mihi arrogare et capere quæ deus non dedit." (Wetstein.) Some apply the words to Jesus :- εἰ δὲ λαμπρότερα τὰ έκείνου, και πάντες πρός αὐτὸν έρχονται, θαυμάζειν οὐ χρή. τοιαῦτα γὰρ τὰ θεῖα. Chrys. But the whole tone of the answer makes the other view more likely. Of course the remark, being general, may in the background have reference to the greater mission of Jesus; but not primarily. The parallelism of ἄνθρωπος here and himself as the subject of $\epsilon l \pi o \nu$ in the next verse, also supports this view: see 28.7 'Not only so, but I have always given the same consistent

29.] Here first, (and here only in our Gospel,) comes from the mouth of the Forerunner, this great symbolical reference which is so common in the other Gospels and in the Epistles. It is remarkable that our Lord brings it forward in His answer to the disciples of John respecting fasting, Matt. ix. 15: where see note on the further import of the terms used.

The φίλος τοῦ νυμφίου (Heb. מֵבְיֵּיִשׁ) was the regular organ of communication in the preliminaries of marriage, and had the ordering of the marriage feast. It is to this last time, and not to any ceremonial custom connected with the marriage rites, that this verse refers. The friend rejoices at hearing the φωνή τοῦ νυμφίου, (see Jer. vii. 34; xvi. 9; xxv. 10: Rev. xviii. 23,) in his triumph and joy, at the marriage. He χαρά χαίρει (see reff.: 1 Thess. iii. 9 is not a parallel case as to construction, for $\hat{\eta}$ there is only by attraction) because he hears in the voice of the Bridegroom an assurance of the happy completion of his mission, and on account of the voice itself, -την ούτω γλυκείαν, την ούτως ἐπέραστον, την ούτω σωτήριον. έστηκώς καί belongs merely to the graphic setting forth of the similitude. αύτη . . . πεπλήρ.] παραδόντος ἐκείνω την νύμφην, καὶ πεπληρωκότος, ως εξρηται, την έγχειρισθεῖσάν μοι διακονίαν. Euthym. 30.] έλαττοῦσθαι, -ώς ήλίου ανατείλαντος έωςφόρον. Euthym. See note on Matt. xi. 2 ff. 31.] Many modern critics, beginning with

Bengel and Wetstein, and including Lücke,

Kuinoel, Olshausen, Tholuck, De Wette,

have the words, not of the Baptist, but of the Evangelist. Lücke and De Wette assume that the Evangelist has put his own thoughts into the Baptist's mouth, or at least mixed them with his words. The reason of this arbitrary proceeding is, (a) that the sentiments of the following verses seem to them not to be congruous with the time and position of the Baptist. But some of them confess (e. g. Lücke, De Wette) that this very position of the Baptist is to them yet unexplained, and are disposed to question the applicability to their idea of it of very much which is undoubtedly recorded to have been said by him. So that we cannot allow such a view much critical weight, unless it can be first clearly shewn, what were the Baptist's convictions concerning the Person and Office of our Lord. (B) That the diction and sentiments of the following verses are so entirely in the style of our Evangelist. But first, I by no means grant this, in the sense which is here meant. It will be seen by the reff. that the Evangelist does not so frequently repeat himself as in most other passages of equal length. And even were this so, the remark made above on vv. 16-21, would apply here also; that the Evangelist's peculiar style of theological expression was formed on some model; and on what more likely than in the first place the discourses of his Divine Master, and then such sententious and striking testimonies as the present? But there is a weightier reason than these for opposing the above view, and that arises from what modern criticism has been so much given to overlook,—the inner coherence of the discourse itself; in which John explains to his disciples the reason why HE must increase; whereas his own dignity was to be eclipsed before Him. This will be seen below as we proceed. And there is nothing inconsistent with what the Lord himself says of the Baptist in these verses. He (the Baptist) ever speaks not as a disciple of Jesus, not as within the Kingdom, afterwards in the onward waning of his days in prison: see note on Matt. xi. 2. ὁ ἄνωθ. ἐρχ. This gives us the reason why HE must increase: His power and His words are not from below, temporary, limited; but are divine and inexhaustible; and, ver. 32, His witness is not, like John's, only of what he has been forewarned to expect, but of that which he has seen and heard. But où Seis, -i. e. in reference to the κόσμος into which He is come, the σκοτία in which His light shines, - no one comparatively, - receives His testimony. The state of men's minds at Jerusalem with regard to Jesus must ere this have been well known to the Baptist. Notice in ver. 31 the collocation of the words as regards emphasis: ὁ των ἐκ τ η s γ η s ἐκ τ η s γ η s ἐστιν, κ. ἐκ τ η s γ η s λαλει. 33, 34.] This exception shews the correctness of the sense just assigned to οὐδείς. δ λαβών αὐτοῦ τὴν μαρτυρίαν καὶ πιστεύων αὐτῷ, ἐβεβαίωσεν, ἔδειξεν, ὅτι ὁ θεὸς ἀληθής ἐστιν ὁ ἀποστείλας αὐτόν, οὕτινός ἐστι τὰ ῥήματα ἃ λαλεί δ δέ μη λαβών αὐτην καὶ ἀπιστῶν αὐτῷ, τοὐναντίον ποιεῖ, καὶ οὐδὲν ἔτερον ή προδήλως θεομαχεί. Entlym.

The middle σφραγίζομαι is more usual in this signification. See instances in Wetάληθής, not as Wetstein, "Deum veracem esse, et quæ per Prophetas promiserat, præstitisse;" this does not suit the context, and besides would require πιστός, not ἀληθής (see 1 John i. 9): but, as above from Euthym., true. yàρ ἐκ μ. . . .] Seeing that the contrast is between the unlimited gift of the Spirit to Him that comes from above, and the limited participation of Him by those who are of the earth; we must not understand the assertion generally, but supply αὐτῷ, as has usually been done, after δίδωσιν. "Spiritus sanctus non habitavit super Prophetas, nisi mensura quadam; quidam enim librum unum, quidam duos vatici-niorum ediderunt." (Vajikra Rabba, in Wetstein.) This unmeasured pouring of the Spirit on Him accounts for his speaking the words of God. 35.7 This, again, is the ground why the Father gives not the Spirit by measure (to Him): see Matt. xi. 27-29, with which this verse forms a remarkable point of connexion, shewing that what is commonly known as John's form of expression was not confined to him, but originated higher, having its traces in the synoptic narrative, which is confessedly, in its main features, inde-36.] Compare ch. i. pendent of him. 12, 13; ver. 15. ἀπειθών may mean disbelieving, see reff. Chap. IV. 1-54.] Manifestation of Himself as the Son of God in SAMARIA AND GALILEE. 1-42.7 On his way back to Galilee through Samaria, he discourses with a Samaritan woman. Confession of his Messiahship by the Samaritans. 1.] An inference may be drawn from this, that our Lord knew the anger of the Pharisees to be more directed against Him than against the Baptist,-probably on account of what had passed in Jerusalem.

ὅτι Ἰησοῦς, not ὅτι αὐτὸς because the report which the Pharisees had heard is given verbatim: the ore is 'recitantis' merely. 2.] Probably for the same reason that Paul did not baptize usually (1 Cor. i. 14-16); viz. because His office was to preach and teach;—and the disciples as yet had no office of this kind. To assume a further reason, e.g. that there might not be ground for those whom the Lord himself had baptized to boast of it, is arbitrary and unnecessary. "Johannes, minister, sua manu baptizavit; discipuli ejus, ut videtur, neminem. At Christus baptizat Spiritu Sancto." Bengel. 4. If He was already on the borders of Samaria, not far from Enon (see note on ch. iii. 23), the direct way was through Samaria. Indeed without this assumption, we know that the Galilæans ordinarily took this way (Jos. Antt. xx. 6. 1, beginning). But there was probably design also in the journey. It could not have been mere speed (πάντως ἔδει τούς ταχύ βουλομένους ἀπελθείν δι' ἐκείνης πορεύεσθαι, Jos. Vit. 52),—since He made two days' stay on the way. Sychar is better known by the O. T. name. of Sychem (Συχέμ), or τὰ Σίκιμα (Josephus, Euseb., &c.), or ἡ Σικίμα (LXX, 3 Kings xii. 25). It was a very old town on the range of Mt. Ephraim, in a narrow valley between Mt. Ebal and Mt. Gerizim. Judg. ix. 7. The name Sychar has been variously derived : from יָשָׁבֶּר, a lie, or שָׁבֶּר, drunken (Isa. xxviii. 1), by some (Reland, Lightfoot), who believe it to have originally been an opprobrious name given by the Jews, but by this time to have lost its signification, and become the usual appellation: by others from Συχέμ, by mere corruption of the terminating liquid \(\mu \) into ρ, Olsh. Very near it was afterwards built Flavia Neapolis (Συχέμ, νῦν ἔρημος, δείκνυται δε δ τόπος εν προαστείοις νέας πόλεωs, Euseb. Onomasticon, in Winer, sub voce). There is a long and interesting history of Sychem and the Samaritan worship on Gerizim, and the Christian church in the neighbourhood, in Robinson's Palestine, iii. 113-136. [See also Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 472 ff. He thinks that Sychar and Shechem are not the same, because at Shechem (Nablus) there are delicious fountains of water, which the woman would hardly have left to draw from a deep well two miles off.] τοῦ χωρ. ὁ ἔδωκ.] This is traditional: it finds however support from Gen. xxxiii. 19, where we find Jacob buying a field near Shechem, and Josh. xxiv. 32, where, on the mention of Joseph's bones being laid there, it is said that it became the inheritance of the children of Joseph. This form of the tradition is supposed to have arisen from the translation by the LXX of Gen. xlviii. 22, eyà δὲ δίδωμί σοι Σίκιμα ἐξαίρετον (της Ερύ, 'one share') ύπερ τους άδελφούς σου: and of Josh. xxiv. 32, έν τη μερίδι του άγρου οδ ἐκτήσατο Ἰακὼβ παρὰ τῶν ᾿Αμορραίων τῶν κατοικούντων έν Σικίμοις . . . καὶ ἔδωκεν αὐτὴν Ἰωσὴφ ἐν μερίδι, where they apparently read or mistook ניהבהר for ויהבהר (3 sing. fut. Kal. w. suffix of מָהַב, a verb which only occurs in the imperative mood, unless it be in the very doubtful place of Hosea iv. 18). Our Lord does not allude to it in the conversation, though the woman does. 6.] Robinson (iii. 112) can only solve the difficulty of the present well standing in a spot watered by so many natural fountains, by supposing that it may have been dug, according to the practice of the patriarchs, by Jacob, in connexion with the plot of ground which he bought, to

ωρα . . . εκτη, mid-day. Townson supposed the sixth hour, according to John, to mean six in the evening, "after the way of reckoning in Asia Minor;"—but, as Lücke observes (i. 580), this way of reckoning in Asia Minor is a pure invention of Townson's. A decisive answer however to such a supposition here, or any where else in our Evangelist, is, that he would naturally have specified whether it was 6 A.M. or P.M. The unusualness of a woman coming to draw water at midday is no argument against its possibility; indeed the very fact of her being alone seems to shew that it was not the common time. This purely arbitrary hypothesis of St. John's way of reckoning the hours has been recently again upheld by Bp. Wordsworth: but it has only harmonistic grounds to rest on. The passage which he urges as supporting it, Martyr. Polycarp, c. 21, p. 1044, ed. Migne, does not in reality give it the least countenance. The Wpa ολδόη there mentioned is much more probably according to the usual Roman com-7.] ἐκ τ. The Rabbis say that a Jew might not cat the bread or drink the wine of a Samaritan: but that appears from this verse to be exaggerated.

perhaps by his dress, more probably by his dialect. There seems to be a sort of playful triumph in the woman's question, q. d. 'even a Jew, when weary and athirst, can humble himself to ask drink of a Samaritan woman. où yàp συγχρ. . . . are the words of the Evangelist to explain her question. συγχράομαι is properly spoken of trade,—but here is in a wider signification. Wetstein quotes from Polybius, παρὰ Ταραντίνων και Λοκρών συγχρησάμενοι πεντηκοντόρους και τρι-Notice, 1) that this explanatory clause is omitted by DN1, and certainly may have been a gloss originally: but the authority is not enough to justify us in bracketing it: 2) that lovδ. and Σαμ. are both anarthrous—'Jews have no dealings with Samaritans.' The fact is abundantly illustrated in the Rabbinical writings: see Schöttg. h. l. The question of the woman shews a lively naïve disposition, which is further drawn out and exemplified by Him who knew what is in man, in the following dialogue. 10.] The important words the gift of God have been misunderstood by many Commentators. Some suppose them to mean 'our Lord himself,' and to be in apposition with the next clause, και τίς ἐστιν κ.τ.λ. Others, this opportunity of speaking with me. Doubtless both these meanings are involved, -especially the former: but neither of them is the primary one, as addressed to the woman. The WATER is, in this first part of the discourse, the subject, and serves as a point of connexion, whereby the woman's thoughts may be elevated, and her desire aroused. The process of the discourse in this particular is similar to that in Acts xiv. 17. From recognizing this water as the gift of God, in its limitation, ver. 13, and its parabolic import, ver. 14, her view is directed to Him who was speaking with her, and the Gift which He should bestow, -THE GIFT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT: see ch. vii. 37-39.

τίς ἐστιν These pregnant words form the second step in our Lord's declaration. He who speaks with thee is no ordinary 'Ioυδαίοs, nor any ordinary man, but One who can give thee the gift of God; One sent from God, and God Himself. All this lies in the words, which however only serve to arouse in the woman's mind the question of ver. 12 (see below).

υδωρ ζων] Designedly used in a double sense by our Lord, that the woman may lay hold of the material meaning, and by it be awakened to the higher one (see reff.). The words bring with them, and in our Lord's inner meaning involved, the performance of all such prophetic promises as Ezek. xxxvi. 25 : Zech. xiii. 1 (see also Jer. ii. 13); but, as regarded the woman, the ordinary sense was that intended for her to fasten on, which she does accordingly. On the question, how this living water could be now given, before Jesus was glorified, see on ch. vii. 38, 39.

11, 12. this, used it, and bequeathed it to us: if thou hast better water, and canst give it (notice the ἔδωκεν in both verses), thou must be greater than Jacob.' There is something also of Samaritan nationality speaking here. Claiming Jacob as her father (όταν μεν εδ πράττοντας βλέπωσι τους 'Ιουδαίους, συγγενείς ἀποκαλοῦσιν, ώς εξ Ίωσήπου φύντες, όταν δε πταίσαντας ίδωσιν, οὐδαμόθεν αύτοῖς προςήκειν λέγουσιν, Jos. Antt. ix. 14. 3), she expresses by this question an appropriation of descent from him, such as almost to exclude, or at all events set at a greater distance, the Jews, to one of whom she believed herself to be speaking.

13, 14. Our Lord, without noticing this, by His answer leaves it to be implied, that, assuming what she has stated, He is greater than Jacob: for his (Jacob's) gift was of water which cannot satisfy: but the water which He should give has living power, and becomes an eternal fountain within. This however, 'that He was greater than Jacob,' lies only in the background: the water is the subject, as The words apply to every similar quenching of desire by earthly means: the desire springs up again;is not satisfied, but only postponed. The manna was as insufficient to satisfy hunger, -as this water, thirst, see ch. vi. 49, 58: it is only the υδωρ ζων, and the άρτος της ζωής, which can satisfy. πίνων sets forth the recurrence, the interrupted seasons, of the drinking of earthly water; - the &s &' av min - the once having tasted, and ever continuing in the increasing power, and living forth-flowing, of that life-long draught. οὐ μὴ διψήσει, shall never have to go away and be exhausted, and come again to be filled; -but shall have the spring at home, in his own breast, -so that he can "draw water with joy out of the wells of salva-tion" (Isa. xii. 3) at his pleasure. "Ubi sitis recurrit, hominis, non aquæ, defectus est." Bengel. γενήσεται πηγή] All earthly supplies have access only into those lower parts of our being where the desires work themselves out—are but local applications; but the heavenly gift of spiritual life which Jesus gives to those who believe on Him, enters into the very secret and highest place of their personal life, the source whence the desires spring out; -and, its nature being living and spiritual, it does not merely supply, but it lives and waxes onward, unto everlasting life, in duration, and also as producing and sustaining it. It should not be overlooked, that this discourse had, besides its manifold and wonderful meaning for us all, an especial moral one as applied to the woman,-who, by successive draughts at the 'broken cistern' of carnal lust, had been vainly seeking solace :--and this consideration serves to bind on the following verses (ver. 16 ff.) to the preceding, by another link besides those 15.] This request noticed below. seems to be made still under a misunderstanding, but not so great an one as at first sight appears. power shall never fail; - which shall quench thirst for ever ; -and half in banter, half in earnest, wishing perhaps besides to see whether the gift would after all be conferred, and how, -she mingles in with the τοῦτο τὸ ὕδωρ,—implying some view of its distinct nature,—her 'not coming hither to draw,'-her willing avoidance of the toil of her noonday journey to the well. We must be able to enter into the complication of her character, and the impressions made on her by the strange things which she has heard, fully to appreciate the spirit of this answer. connexion of this verse with the foregoing has been much disputed; and the strangest and most unworthy views have been taken of it. Some (e.g. Grotius) have strangely referred it to the supposed indecorum of the longer continuance of the colloquy with the woman alone; some more strangely still (Cyril Alex. in Catena, Lücke, p. 588) to the incapacity of the female mind to apprehend the matters of which He was to speak. Both these need surely no refutation. The band of women from Galilee, "last at the cross, and earliest at the tomb," are a sufficient answer to them. Those approach nearer the truth, who believe the command to have been given to awaken her conscience (Maldonatus and al.); or to shew her the divine knowledge which the Lord had of her heart (Meyer). But I am persuaded that the right account is found, in viewing this command, as the first step of granting her request, δός μοι τοῦτο τὸ ὕδωρ. The first work of the Spirit of God, and of Him who here spoke in the fulness of that Spirit, is, to convince of sin. The 'give me this water' was not so simple a matter as she supposed. The heart must first be laid bare before the Wisdom of God: the secret sins set in the light of His countenance: and this our Lord here does. The command itself is of course given in the fulness of knowledge of her sinful condition of life. In every conversation which our Lord held with men, while He connects usually one remark with another by the common links which bind human thought, we perceive that He knows, and sees through, those with whom He speaks. Euthymius, though not seeing the whole bearing of the command, expresses well this last remark: -- έγκειμένης καὶ ζητούσης λαβεῖν, λέγει "Υπαγε κ.τ.λ. προσποιούμενος ὅτι χρὴ κὰκεῖνον κοινωνῆσαι ταύτη τοῦ δώρου. καὶ ὅτι μὲν οὐκ ἔχει ἄνδρα νόμιμον ἐγίνωσκεν, ὡς πάντα εἰδώς" έβούλετο δὲ ταύτην εἰπεῖν ὅτι οὐκ ἔχω ἄνδρα, Ίνα λοιπόν, προφάσεως δραξάμενος, προφητεύση τὰ κατ' αὐτὴν καὶ διορθώσηται ταύτην. θέλει γὰρ τῶν προβρήσεων καὶ τῶν θαυμάτων τὰς ἀφορμὰς παρ' αὐτῶν λαμβάνειν τῶν προςιόντων, ὥςτε καὶ τὴν τοῦ κενοδοξεῖν ὑπόνοιαν διαφεύγειν, καὶ ολκειοῦσθαι μᾶλλον αὐτούς. 17.] This answer is not for a moment to be treated as something unexpected by Him who commanded her (Lücke). He has before Him her whole life of sin, which she in vain endeavours to cover by the doubtful words of this verse. There was literal truth, but no more, in the woman's answer: and the Lord, by His divine knowledge, detects the hidden falsehood of it. Notice it is ἀληθές, not άληθως: this one word was true: further shewn by the emphatic position of ἄνδρα in our Lord's answer. πέντε γάρ ἄνδ. εσχες] These five were certainly lawful husbands; they are distinguished from the sixth, who was not; - probably the woman had been separated from some by divorce (the law of which was but loose among the Samaritans),—from some by death, or perhaps by other reasons more or less discreditable to her character, which had now become degraded into that of an openly licentious woman. The conviction of sin here lies beneath the surface: it is not pressed, nor at the moment does it seem to have worked deeply, for she goes on with the conversation with apparent indifference to it; but our Lord's words in vv. 25, 26 would tend to infix it more deeply, and we find at ver. 29, that it had been working during her journey back to 19. In speaking this her conviction, she virtually confesses all the truth. That she should pass to another subject immediately, seems, as Stier remarks (iv. 125, edn. 2), to arise, not from a wish to turn the conversation from a matter so unpleasing to her, but from a real desire to obtain from this Prophet the teaching requisite that she may pray to God acceptably. The idea of her endeavouring to escape from the Lord's rebuke, is quite inconsistent with her recognition of Him as a prophet. Rather we may suppose a pause, which makes it evident that He does not mean to proceed further with His laying open of her Obs., not σύ (Wordsw.), but $\pi\rho o\phi \dot{\eta}\tau \eta s$, is the word of primary emphasis. $\sigma \dot{\nu}$ has the secondary emphasis, by its very expression. 20.] ἐν τῷ τοῦ τοῦτω—Mount Gerizim, on which once stood the national temple of the Samaritan race. In Neh. xiii. 28 we read that the grandson of the high-priest Eliashib was banished by Nehemiah because he was son-in-law to Sanballat, the Persian satrap of Samaria. Him Sanballat not only received, but (Jos. Antt. xi. 8. 2-4) made him high-priest of a temple which he built on Mount Gerizim. Josephus makes this appointment sanctioned by Alexander, when at Tyre; -but the chronology is certainly not accurate, for between Sanballat and Alexander is a difference of nearly a century. This temple was destroyed 200 years after by John Hyrcanus (B.C. 129), see Jos. Antt. xiii. 9.1; but the Samaritans still used it as a place of prayer and sacrifice, and to this day the few Samaritans resident in Nablus (Sychem) call it the holy mountain, and turn their faces to it in prayer.

They defended their practice by Deut. xxvii. 4, where our reading and the Hebr. and LXX is Ebal, but that of the Samaritan Pentateuch, Gerizim (probably an alteration): also by Gen. xii. 6, 7; xiii. 4; xxxiii. 18, 20: Deut. xi. 26 ff. fathers most likely mean not the patriarchs, but the ancestors of the then Samaὁ τόπος] The definite place spoken of Deut. xii. 5. She pauses, having suggested, rather than asked, a question,—seeming to imply, Before I can receive this gift of God, it must be decided, where I can acceptably pray for it;' and she leaves it for Him whom she now recognizes as a prophet, to resolve this doubt. 21.] Our Lord first raises her view to a higher point than her question implied, or than indeed she, or any one, without His prophetic announcement, could then have attained. ούτε ούτε are exclusive: Ye shall worship the Father, but not (only) in this mountain, τῷ πατρί, as implying the One God and Father of all. There is also, as Calvin remarks (Stier, iv. 129, edn. 2), a "tacita oppositio" between ὁ πατήρ,—and ὁ π. ἡμ. Ἰακώβ, ver. 12, οἱ πατέρες ἡμῶν, ver. 20.

22. But he will not leave the temple of Zion and the worship appointed by God without His testimony. He decides her question not merely by affirming, but by proving the Jewish worship to be the right one. In the Samaritan worship there was no leading of God to guide them, there were no prophetic voices revealing more and more of His purposes. The neuter 3 is used to shew the want of personality and distinctness in their idea of God:-the second 6, merely as corresponding to it in the other member of the sentence. Or perhaps better, both, as designating merely the abstract object of worship, not the personal God. The ἡμεις is remarkable, as being the only instance of our Lord thus speaking. But the nature of the case accounts for it. He never elsewhere is speaking to one so set in opposition to the Jews on a point where Himself and the Jews stood together for God's truth. He now speaks as a Jew. The nearest approach to it is in His answer to the Canaanitish woman, Matt. xv. 24, 26. because: this is the reason why we know what we worship, because the promises of God are made to us, and we possess them and believe them: see Rom. iii. 1, 2.

ή σωτ. ἐκ τ. 'Ι. ἐστ.'] It was in this point especially, expectation of the promised salvation by the great Deliverer (see Gen. xlix. 18), that the Samaritan rejection of the prophetic word had made them so deficient in comparison of the Jews. But not only this;—the Messiah Himself was to spring from among the Jews, and had sprung from among them ; - not coras, but ¿στίν, the abstract present, but perhaps with a reference to what was then happening. See Isa. ii. 1—3. 23.] The discourse returns to the ground taken in ver. 21, but not so as to make ver. 22 parenthetical only: the spiritual worship now to be spoken of is the carrying out and consequence of the σωτηρία just mentioned, and could not have been brought in without it. καὶ νῦν ἐστίν] " Hoc (versu 21 non additum) nunc additur, ne mulier putet, sibi tantisper sedem in Judæa quærendam esse." Bengel. προςκ., as distinguished (1) from hypocrites, who have pretended to worship Him: (2) from all who went before, whose worship was necessarily imperfect.

The εν πνεύματι καὶ άληθεία (not without an allusion to έν τούτω τώ όρει) is, in its first meaning, opposed to έν έθει και ψεύδει, - and denotes the earnestness of spirit with which the true worshippers shall worship: so Ps. exliv. 18, έγγὺς κύριος πᾶσιν τοις επικαλουμένοις αὐτὸν έν άληθεία. Α deeper meaning is brought out where the ground of this kind of worship is stated, in the next verse.

'requires,' from His very nature, but seeks,—is seeking. This seeking on the part of the Father naturally brings in the idea, in the woman's answer, of the Messiah, by Whom He seeks (Luke xix. 10) His true worshippers to gather them out of the world. τοὺς προςκ.] The construction is, the Father is seeking for such to be οἱ προςκυνοῦντες αὐτόν,—'for οί προςκ. αὐτ. of this kind.' τοιού-Tous may be the predicate-'such the Father seeketh his worshippers to be:' or it may be the object- such the Father seeketh as (or to be) his worshippers.

24.] πνεῦμα ὁ θεός was the great Truth of Judaism, whereby the Jews were distinguished from the idolatrous people around them. And the Samaritans held even more strongly than the Jews the pure monotheistic view. Traces of this, remarks

Lücke (from Gesenius), i. 599 note, are found in the alterations made by them in their Pentateuch, long before the time of this history. This may perhaps be partly the reason why our Lord, as Bengel remarks, "Discipulis non tradidit sublimiora," than to this Samaritan woman.

God being pure spirit (perhaps better not 'a Spirit,' since it is His Essence, not His Personality, which is here spoken of), cannot dwell in particular spots or temples (see Acts vii. 48; xvii. 24, 25); cannot require, nor be pleased with, earthly material offerings nor ceremonies, as such: on the other hand, is only to be approached in that part of our being, which is spirit, -and even there, inasmuch as He is pure and holy, with no by-ends nor hypocritical regards, but in truth and earnestness. But here comes in the deeper sense alluded to above. How is the spirit of man to be brought into communion with God? "In templo vis orare; in te ora. Sed prius esto templum Dei." Aug. (Stier, iv. 137, edn. 2.) And how is this to be? cannot make himself the temple of God. So that here comes in the gift of God, with which the discourse began,-the gift of the Holy Spirit, which Christ should give to them that believe on Him: thus we have 'praying ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίω,' Jude 20. So beautifully does the expression ὁ πατήρ here bring with it the new birth by the Spirit, -and for us, the readers of the Gospel, does the discourse of ch. iii. reflect light on this. And so wonderfully do these words form the conclusion to the great subject of these first chapters: 'GoD IS BECOME ONE FLESH WITH US, THAT WE MIGHT BECOME ONE SPIRIT WITH HIM.' 25. These words again seem uttered under a complicated feeling. From her λαλιά, ver. 29, she certainly had some suspicion (in her own mind, perhaps over and beyond His own assertion of the fact : but see note there) that He who had told her all things, &c., was the Christ; and from her breaking in with this remark after the weighty truth which had been just spoken, it seems as if she thought thus, ' How these matters may be, I cannot understand ;-they will be all made clear when the Christ shall come.' The question of ver. 20 had not been answered to her liking or expectation: she therefore puts aside, as it were, what has been said, by a remark on that suspicion which was arising in her mind. certain what expectations the Samaritans had regarding the Messiah. The view here advanced might be well derived from Deut. xviii. 15; -and the name, and much that belonged to it, might have been borrowed from the Jews originally. λεγόμ. χριστός appear to me to be the words of the woman, not of the Evangelist; for in this latter case he would certainly have used & μεσσίαs again in ver. 29. See. also the difference of expression where he inserts an interpretation, ch. i. 42; xix. 13, 17. It is possible that the name & γριστός had become common in popular parlance, like many other Greek words and ἀναγγέλλω is used especially names. of enouncing or propounding by divine or superior authority,—see reff. Of the reasons which our Lord had, thus to declare Himself to this Samaritan woman and through her to the inhabitants of Sychem (ver. 42), as the Christ, thus early in his ministry, we surely are not qualified to judge. There is nothing so opposed to true Scripture criticism, as to form a preconceived plan and rationale of the course of our Lord in the flesh, and then to force recorded events into agreement with it. Such a plan will be formed in our own minds from continued study of the Scripture narrative: - but by the arbitrary and procrustean system which I am here condemning, the very facts which are the chief data of such a scheme, are themselves set aside. When De Wette says, "This early and decided declaration of Jesus is in contradiction with Matt. viii. 4, and xvi. 20,"-he forgets the very different circumstances under which both those injunctions were spoken :--while he

31, 32. The bodily thirst (and hunger probably, from the time of day) which our Lord had felt before, had been and was forgotten in the carrying on of His divine work in the soul of this Samaritan woman. Although eyw and bueis are emphatic, the words are not spoken in blame, for none was deserved: but in fulness and earnestness of spirit; - in a feeling analogous to that which comes upon us when called from high and holy employment to the supply of the body or business of this world. βρῶσις, generally distinguished, as 'eating,' from βρῶμα, 'food' (see ref. 1 Cor.), - is here equivalent to it.

33.] It is very characteristic of the first part of this Gospel to bring forward instances of unreceptivity of spiritual meaning: compare ver. 11; ch. ii. 20; iii. 4; vi. 42, 52. The disciples probably have the woman in their thoughts.

say these words. In the believer on Him, they are partially true,-true as far as he has received the Spirit, and entered into the spiritual life; -but in Him they were absolutely and fully true. His whole life was the doing of the Father's will. We can 'eat and drink, &c. to the glory of God,'-but in Him the hallowing of the Father's name, doing His will, bringing about His Kingdom, was His daily bread, and superseded the thoughts and desires for the other, needful as it was for His humanity. wa is not = 5π i. The latter would imply what was true (but not here expressed), that the absolute doing, &c. was His food;—as it now stands, it implies that it was His food to carry onward to completion that work: to be ever, step after step, having regard to its being completed. My meat is (not to do, as E. V., but) that I may do, &c. In the τελειώσω αὐτοῦ τὸ ἔργον, the way is prepared for the idea introduced in the next verse. These words give an answer to the questioning in the minds of the disciples, and shew that He had been employed in the Father's work during their absence. 35.] The sense of these much-controverted words will be best ascertained by narrowly observing the form of the sentence. ούχ ύμεις λέγετε ότι surely cannot be the intriduction to an observation of what was matter of fact at the time. the words been spoken at a time when it wanted four months to the harvest, and had our Lord intended to express this .- is it conceivable that He should have thus introduced the remark? Would not, must not, the question have been a direct one in that case—'are there not four months?' &c. I know not how to account for this ούχ ύμεις λέγετε ὅτι except that it introduces some common saying which the Jews, or perhaps the people of Galilee only, were in the habit of using. Are not ye accustomed to say, that ? That we hear of no such proverb elsewhere, is not to the point ;-for such unrecorded sayings are among every people. That we do not know whence to date the four months, is again no objection :- there may have been, in the part where the saving was usual (possibly in the land west of the lake of Tiberias, for those addressed were from thence, and the emphatic bueis seems to point to some particular locality), some fixed period in the year, -the end of the sowing, or some religious anniversary,when it was a common saying, that it wanted four months to harvest. And this might have been the first date in the year which had regard to the harvest, and so the best known in connexion with it.

If this be so, all that has been built on this saying, as giving a chronological date, must fall to the ground. (Lightfoot, Meyer (1), Wieseler, i. p. 215 ff., and others, maintain, that since the harvest began on the 16th of Nisan, we must reckon four months back from that time for this journey through Samaria, which would bring it to the middle of Chisleu, i. e. the beginning of December.)

To get the meaning of the latter part of the verse, we must endeavour to follow, as far as may be, the train of thought which pervades the discourse. He that soweth the good seed is the Son of Man: our Lord had now been employed in this His work. But not as in the natural year, so was it to be in the world's lifetime. One-third of the year may elapse, or more, before the sown seed springs up; but the sowing by the Son of Man comes late in time, and the harvest should immediately follow. The fields were whitening for it; these Samaritans (not that I believe He pointed to them approaching, as Chrys. and most expositors, but had them in his view in what he said), and the multitudes in Galilee, were all nearly ready. In the discourse as far as ver. 38, He is δ σπείρων, the disciples (see Acts viii.) were οἱ θερίζοντες:- He was the κεκοπιακώς, they were the είς τον κόπον αὐτοῦ εἰςεληλυθότες. The past is used, as descriptive of the office which each held, not of the actual thing done. I cannot also but see an allusion to the words spoken by Joshua (xxiv.

13), on this very spot; - 'I have given you a land for which ye did not labour $-\epsilon \phi$ ην οὐκ ἐκοπιάσατε ἐπ' αὐτης (αὐτήν Α).

Taking this view, I do not believe there was any allusion to the actual state of the fields at that time. The words ἐπάρατε κ.τ.λ. are of course to be understood literally; -they were to lift up their eyes and look on the lands around them; -and then came the assurance; 'they are whitening already towards the harvest.' And it seems to me that on this view-of the Lord speaking of spiritual things to them, and announcing to them the approach of the spiritual harvest, and none else,—the right understanding of the following verses depends. of course possible that it may have been seed-time; -possible also, that the fields may have been actually whitening for the harvest ;-but to lay down either of these as certain, and build chronological inferences on it, is quite unwarranted.

ηδη belongs certainly to ver. 35, and refers back to ETL. Taken with ver. 36, it would not agree with the truth of the comparison. The harvest was not yet come. The ancient Mss. are not trustworthy guides in division and punctuation, which rather form matter of criticism, in which we stand on the same ground as they. 36.7 The μισθός of the θερίζων is in the χαρά here implied, in having gathered many into eternal life, just as the $\beta p \hat{\omega} \sigma is$ of the σπείρων was His joy already begun in His heavenly work. See Matt. xx. 1—16 and notes. 37.] δ λόγ. ἐστιν [δ] ἀλ., i. e. has place,—applies $= \sigma \nu \mu \beta \epsilon \beta \eta \kappa \epsilon \nu$ in 2 Pet. ii. 22. So Winer, Meyer (1), Stier, but contr. Lücke, De Wette, who question the propriety of the art. and take $[\delta]$ and δ in the predicate, and as δ and δ is John's usage however is to join ό λόγ. ὁ ἀληθινός: see ch. xv. 1. We may also take the words, without doing any violence to the art. before ἀληθινός, 'Herein is that saying the true one. But I still prefer the other way. If we regard the bracketed article as omitted, the sense will of course be, 'Herein is that saying true.' Such however is not St. John's usage: see above.

38.] Here, as often, our Lord speaks of the office and its work as accomplished, which is but beginning (see Isa. xlvi. 10). By akkot here He cannot mean the O. T. Prophets (Grotius, Bengel, Lange), for then His own place would be altogether left out; -and besides, all Scripture analogy is against the idea of the O. T. being the seed of which the N. T. is the fruit:-nor can it be right, as Olshausen maintains, to leave Him out, as being the Lord of the Harvest :- for He is certainly elsewhere, and was by the very nature of the case here, the Sower. The plural is I believe merely inserted as the correspondent word to bueis in the explanation, as it was &Alos—&Alos, in the proverb. (So Lücke, Tholuck, Stier. De Wette denies their interpretation, but gives none of his own.) 39-42.]

The truth of the saying of ver. 35 begins to be manifested. These Samaritans were the foundation of the church afterwards built up there. It does not seem that any miracle was wrought there: αὐτοὶ ἀκηκόαμεν was enough to raise their faith to a point never attained by the Jews, and hardly as yet by the disciples,—that He was the Saviour of the world. Their view seems to have been less clouded by prejudice and narrow-mindedness than that of the Jews; and though the conversion of this people lay not in the plan of the official life of our Lord, or working of His Apostles during it (see Matt. x. 5),—yet we have abundant proof from this history, of His gracious purposes towards them. A trace of this occurrence may be found ch. viii. 48, where see note. Compare throughout Acts viii. 1-25. (In ver. 42 λαλιά is perhaps not to be distinguished from λόγος before: see ch. viii. 43. But it is hardly possible not to see in the word something of allusion to the woman's eager and diffuse report to them.)

43-54. The second miracle of Jesus

43-54.] The second miracle of Jesus in Galilee. The healing of the Ruler's son.
43.] τάς should have been expressed in E. V.,—after the two days.
We find no mention of the disciples again till ch. vi. 3.
44.] Much difficulty has been found in the connexion of this verse, but unnecessarily. Some have supposed that the Evengelist means Judges by λ iδία the Evangelist means Judæa by ἡ ἰδία πατρίς (Orig., Lücke (second edn., but see below), Ebrard, &c.),-which cannot be, for there is no allusion to Judæa at all here, as He came from Samaria, and the verse manifestly alludes to His journey into Galilee: - some, that Capernaum is meant, or Nazareth, and 'He went into Galilee,' as distinguished from one or other of these places (Chrys., Euthym., Cyril, Olsh.); -but neither can this be, for our Evangelist does not so lightly pass over the reasons of the remarks he makes, and there is no allusion to any city in Galilee, but to His going into Galilee in general.

Some again suppose it to be a reason why He did not go into Galilee before, but remained in Judæa and Saπροφήτης ἐν τἢ ἰδίᾳ * πατρίδι τιμὴν οὐκ ἔχει. 45 ὅτε * Matt. xiii. οῦν ἡλθεν εἰς τὴν Γαλιλαίαν, * ἐδέξαντο αὐτὸν οἱ Γαλι- * Matt. x. maria (Theophyl., Meyer (1), and somewhat similarly Neander, L. J. 385, and Jacobi); this however would be equally alien from the simplicity of John's style, and not in accordance with the fact of almost all His teaching and working being in Galilee. Nor is váp to be rendered 'although' (Kuinoel)—a sense (Lücke, i. 613) which it never has. One admissible view is (Tholuck, Lücke (third edn.), De Wette), that this verse refers to the next following, and indeed to the whole narrative which it introduces. It stands as a preliminary explanation of the 'Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe;' and as indicating the contrast between the Samaritans, who believed on Him for His word,-and His own countrymen, who only received Him because they had seen the miracles which He did at Jerusalem. Such use of yap is not unexampled (see Hartung, Partikellehre, i. p. 467; Lücke, 467; Thol.; De Wette; and Matthiæ, Gr. Gr. § 615). In Herod. i. 124 we have & παῖ Καμβύσεω, σε γάρ θευί επορέωσι οὐ γάρ ἄν κοτε es τοσοῦτον τύχης ἀπίκευ σὰ νῦν ᾿Αστυάγεα τον σεωυτοῦ φονέα τίσαι. Soph. Antig. 393: ἀλλ', ἡ γὰρ ἐκτὸς καὶ παρ' ἐλπίδας χαρὰ | ἔοικεν ἄλλη μῆκος οὐδὲν ἡδονῆ, | ήκω κ.τ.λ. And thus the οὖν in the next verse will be a particle connecting it with this preliminary reason given. But έμαρτύρησεν is not to be taken as a pluperfect. A simpler view still is this: the reason (ver. 1) why He left Judæa for Galilee was, because of the publicity which was gathering round Himself and his ministry. He betakes Himself to Galilee therefore, to avoid fame, testifying that His own country (Galilee)

was that where, as a prophet, He was least likely to be honoured. 45.7 They received Him, but in accordance with the proverbial saying just recorded;—not for any honour in which they themselves held Him, or value which they had for His teaching; but on account of His fame in Jerusalem, the metropolis,—which set them the fashion in their estimate of men and things. καὶ αὐτοὶ γάρ, inserted for those readers who might not be aware of the practice of the Galilæans to frequent 46. ouv. the feasts at Jerusalem. perhaps (see above) because of the receptivity of Him from signs and wonders merely,-not as a Prophet from His teaching. But it is hardly safe in this Gospel to mark the inference in our so strongly: it is St. John's habitual particle of sequence, even where that sequence is not strictly logical, only temporal, and thus in God's purposes, no doubt, consequential.

βασιλικός] ή έκ γένους βασιλικοῦ, ἡ ὡς ἀξίωμά τι κεκτημένος ἀφ' οὖπερ ἐκαλεῖτο βασιλικός (Euthym., Chrys.), ἡ ώς ὑπηρέτης βασιλικός (Euthym.). Origen thinks he may have been one of the household of Cæsar, having some business in Judæa at that time. But the usage of Josephus is perhaps our surest guide. He uses Bao. to distinguish the soldiers, or courtiers, or officers of the kings (Herods or others), from those of Rome,-but never to designate the royal family: see B. J. vii. 5. 2: Antt. xv. 8. 4. So that this man was probably an officer of Herod Antipas. He may have been Chuza, Herod's steward, Luke viii. 3: but this is pure conjecture. The man seems to have been a Jew: see below. 47, 48.]

Lord 'not quenching the smoking flax:' just as His reproof of the Samaritan woman was of His 'not breaking the bruised reed.' The little spark of faith in the breast of this nobleman is by Him lit up into a clear and enduring flame for the light and comfort of himself and his house. The charge brought See on ch. ii. 12. against them, ἐἀν μη κ.τ.λ., does not imply, as some (Raphel and Storr) think, that they would not believe signs and wonders heard of, but required to see them (thus laying the stress on ίδητε)-for in this case the expression would certainly have been fuller, ίδητε τοις όφθαλμοις, or something similar; -and it would not accord with our Lord's known low estimate of all mere miracle-faith, to find Him making so weighty a difference between faith from miracles seen and faith from miracles heard. The words imply the contrast between the Samaritans, who believed because of His word, and the Jews (the plural reckoning the βασιλικός among them), who would not believe but through signs and prodigies: see 1 Cor. i. 22. And observe also that it is not implied that even when they had seen signs and wonders, they would believe: - they required these as a condition of their faith, but even these were rejected by them:

see ch. xii. 37. But even with such inadequate conceptions and conditions of faith, our Lord receives the nobleman, and works the sign rather than dismiss him. It was otherwise in Matt. xvi. 1 ff. 49.] Here is the same weakness of faith,-but our Lord's last words have made visible impression. It is like the Syrophænician woman's rejoinder,—'Yea, Lord; but . . . ,' only the faith is of a far less noble kind than hers. He seems to believe it necessary that Jesus should be on the spot; -not that there was any thing strange or blameable in this, for Martha and Mary did the same, ch. xi. 21, 32: - and to think that it would be too late when his child had expired; -not imagining that He to whom he spoke could raise the dead. The bringing out and strengthening of the man's faith by these words was almost as great a spiritual miracle, as the material one which they indicated. We may observe the difference between our Lord's dealing here and in the case of the centurion (Matt. viii. 6 ff. and ||). There, when from humility the man requests Him to speak the word only, He offers to go to his house: here, when pressed to go down, He speaks the word only. Thus (as Trench observes, after Chrysostom) the weak faith δ παῖς αὐτοῦ $^{\rm m}$ ζη̂. 52 $^{\rm n}$ ἐπύθετο οὖν την ὥραν παρ' αὐτῶν $^{\rm m}$ ver. 50 . $^{\rm n}$ with acc., εἰν η΄ $^{\rm o}$ κομψότερον $^{\rm p}$ ἔσχεν. εἶπον οὖν αὐτῷ ὅτι $^{\rm q}$ ἐχθὲς $^{\rm Acts xxiii. 20}$ σηίν, $^{\rm m}$ $^{\text{T}}$ ὅραν ἑβδόμην $^{\text{S}}$ ἀφῆκεν αὐτὸν $^{\text{O}}$ st πυρετός. $^{\text{S3}}$ ἔγνω $^{\text{II}}$ τη παρά, Ματι $^{\text{II}}$ οῦν $^{\text{O}}$ πατὴρ ὅτι $^{\text{II}}$ $^{\text{O}}$ ἐκείνη τῆ ὅρα $^{\text{E}}$ $^{\text{$

51. He appears [see below] to have gone leisurely away, -for the hour (1 P.M.) was early enough to reach Capernaum the same evening (twenty-five miles): in confidence that an amendment was taking place, which he at present understood to be only a gradual one. 52, 53.] коцψως εχειν in this sense is found in Arrian. Dissert. Epictet. iii. 10, cited by most of the Commentators. ὅταν ὁ ἰατρός εἰςέρχηται, μη φοβείσθαι τί είπη μηδ' αν είπη, κομψως έχεις, ύπερχαίρειν μηδ' άν είπη, κακώς έχεις, άθυμεῖν

άφηκεν αὐτ. ὁ πυρ.] This was probably more than he expected to hear; and the coincidence of so sudden a recovery with the time at which Jesus had spoken the words to him (after ἐκείνη τῆ ὥρα understand αφηκέν αὐτὸν δ πυρετός), raises his faith at length into a full belief of the Power and Goodness and the Mesgialship of Him, who had by a word commanded the disease, and it had obeyed. The eniotevoev, absolutely, implies that in the fullest sense he and all his became disciples of Jesus. It is very different from ἐπίστευσεν τῷ λόγφ δν εἶπ. Ἰησ. in ver. 50-as believing on HIM must be always different from believing on any thing else in the world, be it even His own word or His own ordinances. Here the advocates of the (imaginary-see above on ver. 6) Asiatic division of the hours by St. John, suppose him to have put that division into the mouth of Jews in Galilee. But that division would in reality not help the narrative here at all, as they maintain. The βασιλικός probably set out, as indeed the narrative implies, immediately on hearing our Lord's assurance, and spent the night on the way. Indeed, curiously enough, Bp. Wordsw. makes him do this, and yet maintains the seventh hour to have been 7 P.M. 54.] The meaning of the Evangelist clearly is, that this was the second Galilæan miracle (see ch. iii. 2, and ver. 45). But (1) how is that expressed in the words? The σημεῖα which He did at Jerusalem in the feast being omitted, the πάλιν δεύτερον σ. naturally carries the thoughts back to a former one related; and the clause added (ἐλθὼν κ.τ.λ.) shews, not that a miracle prior to this, during this return visit, has been passed over,but that as the scene of this second was in Galilee, so that former one, to which δεύτ. refers, must be sought in Galilee And then (2) why should this so particularly be stated? Certainly, it seems to me, on account of the part which this miracle bore in the calling out and assuring of faith by the manifestation of His glory, as that first one had done before. By that (ch. ii. 11), His disciples had been convinced: by this, one (himself a type of the weak and unworthy in faith) outside the circle of His own. By both, half-belief was strengthened into faith in Him: but in each case it is of a different kind. It is an interesting question, whether or not this miracle be the same as the healing of the centurion's servant (or son, Matt. ?) in Matt. viii. 5: Luke vii. 1. Irenaus appears to hold the two narratives to be the same history (appears only; for his words are, "Filium centurionis absens verbo curavit dicens Vade, filius tuus vivit," Hær. ii. 22. 3, p. 147: which remark may be simply explained by his having cited from memory, and thus either made this Baoilikas a centurion .- or, which is more probable, having understood the mais in Matt. viii. as a son, and made our Lord there speak very similar words to those really uttered by Him, but which are in reality found here): so Eusebius also in his canons. Chrysostom notices, but opposes the view: -and it has never in modern times gained many advocates, being only held by Semler, Seiffarth, and the interpreters of the Straussian school. Indeed, the internal evidence is all against it: not only (Chrys.) άπο του άξιώματος, άλλα και άπο της πίστεωs, does the man in one case differ from the man in the other. The inner kernel of the history is, in our case here,the elevation of a weak and mere wonderseeking faith into a deep conviction of the personal power and love of our Lord; in the other, the commendation of a noble confession of our Lord's divine power, indicating great strength and grasp of faith, and inducing the greatest personal humility. And the external point brought out in the commendation, οὐδὲ ἐν τῷ 'Ισραήλ, is not only different from, but stands in absolute contrast with, the depreciating charge here, ἐὰν μὴ σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα ίδητε, ου μη πιστεύσητε.

Olshausen (whose commentary on John is far less elaborate than on the other Gos. pels, which may account for my referring less often to it) well remarks, that this narrative may be regarded as a sequel to

cate immediate succession, he uses μετὰ τοῦτο, ch. ii. 12; xi. 7, 11; xix. 28: when mediate, after an interval, μετὰ ταῦτα, ch. iii. 22; v. 14; vi. 1; vii. 1; xix. 38. So that apart from other considerations which would lead us to the same conclusion, we may infer that some interval has elapsed since the last verse έορτη τ. 'loub. Few points of ch. iv. have been more controverted, than the question, what this feast was. I will give the principal views, and then state my own conclusion. (I have abridged the following statement principally from Lücke's note, ii. 1—15.) (1) Irenæus understands it (Hær. ii. 22. 3, p. 147) to be the second Passover of our Lord's ministry. Origen (whose commentary on this chapter is lost) mentions this view (tom. xiii. 39, vol. iv. p. 250), but apparently does not approve it. (MS. A reads ην εορτη των α(υμων κ.τ.λ.) This is the view of Luther, Calovius, Scaliger, Grotius, Lightfoot, Lampe, Kuinoel. (2) Cyril Alex. and Chrysostom think it to be the Pentecost; similarly Euthym. and Theophyl. This opinion prevailed in the Greek Church; and has been defended by Erasmus, Calvin, Beza, &c., and more recently by Bengel in his Harmony. (3) Kepler first, suggested the idea that it might be the feast of Purim, (Esth. ix. 21, 26,) almost immediately preceding the Passover (the 14th and 15th of Adar). This was adopted by Petavius, and has been the general view of the modern chronologists. So Lamy (Apparat. Chronol.), Hug, Lücke (1st edn.), Olshausen, Meyer, Wieseler, Stier, Neander, Winer. (4) The feast of Tabernacles has been suggested by Cocceins, and is supported by one ms. (131, which adds ή σκηνοπηγία.) (5) Kepler and Petavius thought it also possible that the feast of Dedication (see ch. x. 22) might be meant. So that almost every Jewish feast finds some supporters. lieve with Lücke (3rd edn.), De Wette, and Tholuck, that we cannot with any probability gather what feast it was. Seeing as I do no distinct datum given in ch. iv. 35, nor again in ch. vi. 1, and finding nothing in this chapter to determine the nature of this feast, I cannot attach any weight to most of the elaborate marks that when John wishes to indi-

chronological arguments which have been raised on the subject. It can hardly have been a Passover, both on account of the omission of the article before έυρτή (see ch. vi. 4), and because if so, we should have an interval of a whole year between this chapter and the next, which is not probable. Nor can it have been the Dedication, in the winter; for then the multitude of sick would have hardly been waiting in the porches of Bethesda. The feast of Purim would nearest agree with the subsequent events; and it seems as if our Lord did not go up to Jerusalem at the Passover next following (ch. vi. 4; vii. 1), so that no difficulty would be created by the proximity of the two feasts, unless, with De Wette, we believe that the interval was too little for what is related ch. vi. 1-3 to have happened. But it may be doubted, (1) whether it was a general practice to go up to Jerusalem at the Purim: (2) whether our Lord would be likely to observe it, even if it was.

No reason need be given why John does not name the feast; it is quite in accordance with his practice of mentioning nothing that does not concern his subject-matter. Thus the Passover is mentioned ch. ii. 13, because of the buying and selling in the temple; again, ch. vi. 4, to account for the great multitude, and as eminently suiting (see notes) the subject of His discourse there; the feast of Tabernacles, ch. vii. 2, because of the practice alluded to by our Lord in ver. 37; that of the Dedication, ch. x. 22, to account for His being in Solomon's porch because it was winter; but in this chapter, where there is nothing alluding to the time or nature of the feast, it is not specified.

'Inσους-and probably His disciples: for the same expression is used ch. ii. 13, whereas we find, ch. iii. 22, that His disciples were with Him: compare also ch. vii. 10 and ch. ix. 2. 2.] ἔστιν has been thought by Bengel and others to import that John wrote his Gospel before the destruction of Jerusalem. But this must not be pressed. He might have spoken in the present without meaning to be literally accurate at the moment when he was writing (see Prolegg. to έπὶ τῆ προβ., pro-John, § iv. 6). bably near the sheep-gate,—mentioned by Nehemiah, see reff. The situation of this gate is unknown; -it is traditionally supposed to be the same with that now called St. Stephen's gate; but inaccurately, for no wall existed in that quarter till the time of Agrippa (Robinson, i. 472). Eusebius, Jerome, and the Itinerarium Hieros, speak of a προβατική κολυμβήθρα, so also probatica piscina, Vulg. reading λεγομένη would be more usual: perhaps ¿mil. implies that it had another $B\eta\theta\epsilon\sigma\delta\acute{a}=\mathrm{Syr.}$ אַכָּת הַסָבָּא, the house (place) of mercy, or of grace. Its present situation is very uncertain. Robinson established by personal inspection the fact of the subterranean connexion of the pool of Siloam (see ch. ix. 7, note; and the supplementary note at the end of this volume) and that called the Fountain of the Virgin (i. 501 ff.); and has made it probable that the Fountain under the grand Mosk is also connected with them (i. 509 ff.); in fact that all these are but one and the same spring. (See also some interesting particulars respecting an attempt made subsequently to prove this connexion, and mention of a fourth fountain with the same peculiar taste as the water of Siloam, in Williams's Holy City, pp. 381 ff.) Now this spring, as he himself witnessed, (i. 506,) is an intermittent one, as indeed had been reported before by Jerome (on Isa. viii. 6), Prudentius (in Trench, Mir. p. 247, edn. 2), William of Tyre, and others. There might have been then, it is obvious, some artificially constructed basin in connexion with this spring, the site and memory of which have perished, which would present the phænomenon here described: see be-The spot now traditionally known as Bethesda is a part of the fosse round the fort or tower Antonia, an immense reservoir or trench, seventy-five feet deep. But, as Robinson observes (i. 489), there is not the slightest evidence that can identify it with the Bethesda of the N. T.

This pool is not mentioned by Joseπέντε στοàs έχ. Probably these were for the shelter of the sick persons, and were arches or porticos, opening upon and surrounding the reservoir. στοά έστιν ή παρ' ήμιν λεγομένη καμάρα, ή καί δ θόλος. [ἐκδεχ. . . . κίνησιν, and ver. 4. spuriousness of this controverted passage seems to me more clear than when I prepared my Second Edition. The very rea-sons which Stier and De Wette allege in its favour, and which then weighed with me, will on more consideration be found to range themselves on the other side. Let us conceive of the matter thus. The facts, of the assemblage of sick persons round the pool, and of the answer of the sick man in ver. 7, were recorded in the sacred text as we now find them, and nothing else. In the background, and explanatory of both, was the popular belief of the Jews, not alleged by the Evangelist. In very early times, this deficiency was supplied by the insertion of the spurious passage. I say, in very early times: for Tertullian refers to it in a way which leaves no doubt that he read it entire. "Piscinam Bethsaidam (cf. digest on ver. 2) angelus interveniens commovebat: observabant qui valetudinem querebantur. Nam si quis prævenerat descendere illuc, queri post lavacrum desinebat." De Bapt. c. 5, vol. i. p. 1205. So that the fact of so many different kinds of sick persons being mentioned here (Stier), and that of the connexion of the account almost requiring this passage as its explanation (De Wette), points to the reason why it was put in, to clear up a narrative otherwise obscure. I would not lay much stress on the variations in the passage, which are only such as are perpetually meeting us in the un-doubted text: but the fact that there are no less than seven words used either here only, or here only in this sense, is strong against its genuineness: as is the concurrence of B, C, D, and & in omitting it. Of N. T. critics, Griesb. brackets it, Tischdf., Meyer, and Treg. omit it,-while Lachm. retains it in his text. De Wette, Lücke, and Luthardt, are undecided, but inclined more or less strongly against it. As a marginal gloss, it certainly does good

But this is very improbable, see ver. 17. Our Lord did not thus appeal to his hearers' prejudices, and make His grace dependent on them. Besides, the byins yeverbar had in the mind of the man no reference to a healing such as there would be any objection to on the Sabbath; but to the cure by means of the water, which he was there to seek. The question is one of those by which He so frequently testified his compassion, and established (so to speak) a point of connexion between the spirit of the person addressed, and his own gracious purposes. Possibly it may have conveyed to the mind of the poor cripple the idea that at length a compassionate person had come, who might put him in at the next troubling of the water. It certainly is possible that the man's long and apparently hopeless infirmity may have given him a look of lethargy and despondency, and the question may have arisen from this: but there is no ground for supposing (Schleiermacher) blame conveyed by it, still less that he was an impostor labouring under some trifling complaint (Paulus and others), and wishing to represent it more important than it was. 7.] The man's answer implies the popular belief which the spurious but useful insertion in vv. 3, 4 expresses. Bauer asks why the person who brought him there every day, could not have put him in? But no such person is implied. The same slow motion which he describes here, would suffice for his daily coming and going.

8.] The αρον τ. κρ. σου has been treated (Stier, iv. 168, edn. 2: Trench, Mir. 251, edu. 2) as making a difference between the man lame from his birth in Acts iii. 8, who walked and leaped and praised God; and this man, who, since sin had been the cause of his disease (ver. 14), is ordered to carry his bed, "a present memento of his past sin." Possibly; but our Lord must have had in

OUK ELECTIV The bearing of burdens on the Sabbath was forbidden not only by the glosses of the was forbided in the law itself. See Neh. xiii. 15—19: Exod. xxxi. 13—17: Jer. xvii. 21, 22. And our Lord does not, as in another case (Luke xiii. 15, 16), appeal here to the reasonableness of the deed being done on the Sabbath, salvo sabbato, but takes altogether loftier ground, as being One greater than the Sabbath. The whole kernel of this incident and discourse is not, that it is lawful to do works of mercy on the Sabbath: but that the Son of God

11.] The man's excuse is simple and sufficient; and for us, important, inasmuch as it goes into the depth of the matter, and is by the Jews themselves accepted. He who had power to make him whole, had power to suspend that law which was, like the healing, God's work. The authority which had overruled one appointment of Providence, could overrule another. I do not mean that this reasoning was present to the man's mind;—he very likely spoke only from intense feeling of obligation to One who had done so much for him ;-but it lay beneath the words, and the Jews recognized it, by transferring their blame, from the man, to Him who healed him. 12.] Not, 'who is he that healed thee?' but they carefully bring out the unfavourable side of what had taken place, as malicious persons always do. 13.] Difficulty has been found here from the supposed improbability that some should not have told him, seeing that Jesus was by this time well known in Jerusalem. But this is wholly unnecessary. His fame had not been so spread yet, but that He might during the crowd of strangers at the feast pass unnoticed. ἐξένευσεν, passed on unobserved: just spoke the healing words, and then went on among the crowd; so that no particular attention was attracted to Himself, either by the sick man or others. The context requires this interpretation: being violated by the ordinary one, that Jesus 'conveyed himself away, because a multitude was in the place:' for that would imply that attention had been attracted towards him which He wished to avoid; and in that case he could hardly fail to have been known to the man and to others. Observe, ἐξένευσεν has for its understood object, the man subjectively: -escaped his notice, a crowd

The xelpov Tt, as Trench observes (Mir. 254, edn. 2), "gives us an awful glimpse of the severity of God's judgments:"—see Matt. xii. 45. 15.] The man appears to have done this partly in obedience to the authorities; partly perhaps to complete his apology for himself (Bengel). We can hardly imagine ingratitude in him to have been the cause; especially as δ ποιήσας αὐτὸν ὑγιῆ speaks so plainly of the benefit received: compare ver. 11 16.] εδίωκον is not used in the sense of legal prosecution in the N. T.: - persecuted is the best word for it.

17.7 The true keeping of the rest of the Sabbath was not that otiose and unprofitable cessation from even good deeds, which they would enforce: the Sabbath was made for man; -and, in its Jewish form, for man in a mere state of legal discipline (which truth could not yet be brought out to them, but is implied in this verse, because His people are even as He is-in the liberty wherewith He hath made them free); whereas He, the onlybegotten of the Father, doing the works of God in the world, stands on higher ground, and hallows, instead of breaking the Sabbath, by thus working on it. "He is no more a breaker of the Sabbath than God is, when He upholds with an energy that knows no pause the work of His creation from hour to hour, and from moment to moment; 'My Father worketh hitherto, and I work;' My work is but the reflex of His work. Abstinence from outward work belongs not to the idea of a Sabbath, it is only more or less the necessary condition of it for beings so framed as ever to be in danger of losing the true collection and rest of the spirit in the multiplicity of earthly toil and business. Man indeed must cease from his work if a higher work is to find place in him. He scatters himself in his work, and therefore he must collect himself anew, and have seasons for so doing. But with Him who is one with the Father, it is otherwise. In Him the deepest rest is not excluded by the highest activity." (Trench, Mir. p. 257, edn. 2.) 18.] The ground of the charge is now shifted; and by these last words (ver. 17), occasion is given for one of our Lord's most weighty discourses.

The Jews understood His words to mean nothing short of peculiar personal γ = Matt. v. 10, ch. vii. 20 τον μόνον γ ἔλυεν τὸ σάββατον, ἀλλὰ καὶ πατέρα 2 ἴδιον Abdeg 20 x. 35 σης. 2 ch. 1.42 2 καὶ 2 έλεγεν τὸν θεόν, bc ἴσον ἑαυτὸν b ποιῶν τῷ c θεῷ. 19 ἀττ- 19 化 19 τον 1 cor, vii. 2. 2 εκρίνατο οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς ἸΑμὴν ἀμὴν 18 1. 33. 1 cor, vii. 2. 3 2 Ματέ x. 18 γείνατο οὖν ὁ ἀναται ὁ υίὸς ποιεῖν d ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ οὐδέν, bc Ματέ x. 12 σαλγες. ἐὰν μή τι βλέπη τὸν πατέρα ποιοῦντα· ὰ γὰρ ᾶν ἐκεῖνος ix 15. c τον μίι. 6. c τον μή τι βλέπη τὸν πατέρα ποιοῦντα· ὰ γὰρ ᾶν ἐκεῖνος ix 15. c τον μίι. 6. c τον μίι. 6. c τον μίν. 66,59. Sonship, and thus equality of nature with God. And that this their understanding was the right one, the discourse testifies. All might in one sense, and the Jews did in a closer sense, call God their, or our, Father; but they at once said that the individual use of 'MY FATHER' by Jesus had a totally distinct, and in their view a blasphemous, meaning: this latter especially, because He thus made God a participator in his crime of breaking the sabbath. Thus we obtain from the adversaries of the faith a most important statement of one of its highest and holiest 19.7 The discourse is a wonderful setting forth of the Person and Office of the Son of God in His Ministrations as the Word of the Father. It still has reference to the charge of working on the Sabbath, and the context takes in our Lord's answer both to this, ver. 17, and to the Jews' accusation, ver. 18. In this verse, He states that He cannot work any but the works of God: cannot, by his very relationship to the Father, by the very nature and necessity of the case ;the ἀφ' ἐαυτοῦ being an impossible supposition, and purposely set here to express one:-the Son cannot work of Himself, because He is the Son: His very Person presupposes the Father's will and counsel as His will and counsel, -and His perfect knowledge of that will and counsel. And this, because every creature may abuse its freedom, and will contrary to God: but THE SON, standing in essential unity with God, cannot, even when become Man, commit sin,-break the Sabbath; for His whole Being and Working is in and of å yàp åv . . .] This clause con-God. verts the former proposition, and asserts its truth when thus converted. 'For it is the very nature of the Son to do whatever the Father doeth.' Also, to do these works ouoiws -after the same plan and proceeding, so that there can be no discord, but unity. 20.] For (this last is ensured by the fact, that) the Father loves the Son, and shews to Him (in this the Lord sets forth to us the unfolding of the will and purposes of the Father to (Mark xiii. 32: Acts i. 7) and by Him. in His Mediatorial office) all things which He Himself does (all the purposes of His secret counsel;-for with the Father, doing is willing; it is only the Son who acts in time); and this manifestation will go on increasing in majesty, that the wonder which now is excited in you by these works may be brought out to its full measure (in the acceptation or rejection of the Son of God-wonder leading naturally to the τιμή of ver. 23). 21. It is very important to observe the distinction here between the working of the Eternal Son (in creation, e. g.) as He is ἐν οὐρανῷ, with God, and His working in the state of His humiliation in which the Father should by degrees advance Him to exaltation and put His enemies under His feet. Of the latter of these mention is made (ver. 20) in the future, of the former in the present. The former belong to the Son as His proper and essential work: the latter are opened out before Him in the process of His passing onward in the humanity which He has taken. And the unfolding of these latter shall all be in the direction of, and in accordance with, the eternal attributes of the Son: see ch. xvii. 5: resulting in His being exalted to the right hand of the Father. So here,—as it is the Father's essential work to vivify the dead (see Rom. viii. 11: 1 Sam. ii. 6 al.), so the Son vivifies whom He will: this last ους θέλει not implying any selection out of mankind, nor said merely to remove the Jewish prejudice that their own nation alone should rise from the dead,-but meaning, that in every instance where His will is to vivify, the result invariably follows. serve, this ζωοποιεί lays hold of life in its innermost and deepest sense, and thus finds its illustration in the waking both of the outwardly and the spiritually dead.

22.] In the οὐδὲ γάρ is implied that as the Father does not Himself, by His own proper act, vivify any, but commits all quickening power to the Son: -so is it with judgment also. And judgment contains eminently in itself the obs $\theta \in \lambda \in \mathcal{C}$,—when $\zeta \omega \circ \pi$. is understood—as it must be now-of bestowing everlasting life. Again, the raising of the outwardly dead is to be understood as a sign that He who works it is appointed Judge of quick and dead, for it is a part of the office of that Judge ;- in the vivifying, the judgment is made: see below, ver. 29, and Ps. lxxii. 1—4. 23.] This being so, the end of all is, the honour of the Father in and by the Son. He (the Son) is the Lord of life, and the Judge of the world; -all must honour Him with equal honour to that which they pay to the Father:and whosoever does not, however he may imagine that he honours or approaches God, does not honour him at all; -because He can only be known or honoured by us as 'THE FATHER WHO SENT HIS Son.' 24.7 What follows, to ver. 30 incl., is an expansion of the two assertions in vv. 21, 22,—the ζωοποιείν and the κρίνειν,-intimately bound up as they are together. There is a parallelism in vv. 24 and 25 which should be noticed for the right understanding of the words. δ τδν λόγον μου ἀκούων in one, answers to οί νεκροι ἀκούσονται της φωνης τοῦ υίοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ in the other. It is a kind of hearing which awakens to life, -one accompanied by πιστεύειν τῷ πέμψαντί με. And this last is not barely 'Him who sent Me,' but Him, the very essence of belief in Whom is in this, THAT HE SENT ME (see ch. xii. 44). And the dative here after πιστεύω expresses that belief in the testimony of God that He hath sent His Son, which is dwelt on so much 1 John v. 9-12, where, ver. 10, we have the same δ μη πιστεύων τῷ θεῷ.

Exet [. al.] So 1 John v. 12, 13. The πιστεύων and the έχει ζ. al. are commensurate: - where the faith is, the possession of eternal life is :- and when the one remits, the other is forfeited. But here the faith is set before us as an enduring faith, and its effects described in their completion (see Eph. i. 19, 20). είς κρίσιν ούκ έρχεται, - κρίσις being the separation, -the effect of which is to gather out of the Kingdom all that offendeth ; - and thus regarding especially the damnatory part of judgment,—he who believes comes not into, has no concern with, κρίσις. Compare Ps. cxlii. 2 LXX. The reckoning which ends with εὖ ἀγαθὲ δοῦλε, is not κρίσις: the reward is of free grace. In this sense, the believers in Christ will not be judged according to their works: they are justified before God by faith, and by God-θεδς δ δικαιών, τίς δ κατακρίνων; Their 'passage over' from death into life has already taken place,—from the state of spiritual death into that ζωη αἰώνιος, which in their believing state they exour.

already. It is to be observed that our Lord speaks in very similar terms of the unbelieving being condemned already, in The perfect sense of ch. iii. 18. μεταβέβηκεν must not be weakened nor explained away, - see ref. 25.] This verse continues to refer to spiritual awakening from the dead. The Epyeral ωρα κ. νῦν ἐστιν is an expression (see ref.) used of those things which are to characterize the spiritual Kingdom of Christ, which was even now begun among men, but not yet brought (until the day of Pentecost, Acts ii.) to its completion. Thus it cometh, in its fulness,-and even now is begun. οἱ νεκροί,—in reference to ἐκ θανάτου of the preceding verse -the spiritually dead: see below on της φωνης, His call to awake, in its widest and deepest sense ;by His own preaching, by His Apostles, His ministers, &c. &c. In all these He speaks to the spiritually dead. άκούσ.] Not ἀκούσαντες merely, which would be 'and having heard it, shall live: but of ἀκούσ., and THEY WHO have heard it (or, who hear it) shall live. This determines the verse to be spoken of spiritual, not bodily awakening. ακούσαντες are the persons to whem the Lord cried so often ὁ έχων ὧτα ἀκούειν, ἀκουέτω: - the persons who stand opposed to those addressed in ver. 40, οὐ θέλετε έλθεῖν πρός με, Ίνα ζωὴν ἔχητε.

Σήσουσιν is explained in the next verse.

26, 27.] We have here again ζωοποιείν and κρίνειν bound together as the two great departments of the Son's working; -the former, as substantiating the ζήσουσιν just uttered; the latter, as leading on to the great announcement of the next verse. But the two departments spring from two distinct sources, united in the Person of the Incarnate Son of God. The Father hath given Him to have life in Himself, as He is THE SON OF GOD. We have none of us life in ourselves: in Him we live and move and have our being. But He, as the Father is, is the source of Life. Then again the Father hath given Him power to pass judgment, because He is THE SON OF MAN; man is to be judged by Man,-by that Man whom God hath appointed, who is the inclusive Head of humanity, and to whom mankind, and man's world, pertain by right of covenant-purchase. This κρίσιν ποιείν leads the thought to the great occasion when judgment shall be executed; which accordingly is treated of in the next verse. 28, 29.] μη θαυμ., as ch. iii. 7, introduces a matter of even greater wonder to them;—the astounding proof which shall be given in the face of the universe that έρχεται ώρα, but not καl νῦν this is so. ¿στιν this time, - because He is now speaking of the great day of the resurrection: when not merely of verpol, but mávtes of ev τοις μνημείοις, shall hear His voice, and oi ἀκούσαντες are not specified, because all shall hear in the fullest sense. Observe that here, as elsewhere, when the judgment according to works is spoken of, it is the great general resurrection of Matt. xxv. 31 -46, which (and the notes) compare. So here we have not of πιστεύσαντες and of μή πιστεύσαντες, but the categories reach far wider, including indeed in this most general form the first resurrection unto life also-and the two great classes are described as οἱ τὰ ἀγ. ποιήσαντες and οἱ τὰ φαῦλα πράξαντες. On the difference between ποιέω and πράσσω, see note on ch. iii. 20, 21. Observe, that ζωή and kpious stand opposed here, as in ver. 24:-not that there is no such thing as an ανάστασις θανάτου (Schleiermacher, in Stier, iv. 194, edn. 2), but that it is involved in this kpious. Olshausen observes (ii. 153) that this, and Acts xxiv. 15, are the only direct declarations in the N. T. of a bodily resurrection of the unjust as well as of the just. It is implied in some places, e. g. Matt. x. 28, and less plainly in Matt. xxv. 34 ff.: Rev. xx. 5, 12, and directly asserted in the O.T., Dan. xii. 2. In 1 Cor. xv., -as the object was to convince believers in Christ of the truth of the resurrection of their bodies, -no allusion is made to those who are not believers. Here begins (see Stier, iv. 195, edn. 2) the second part of the discourse,-but bound on most closely to the first (ver. 23),treating of the testimony by which these things were substantiated, and which they ought to have received. This verse is, however, perhaps rather a point of transition to the next, at which the testimony is first introduced. As the Son does nothing of Himself,-but His working and His judgment all spring from His deep unity of will and being with the Father,—this His great and last judgment, and all His other ones, will be just and holy (He being not separate from God, but one with Him); and therefore His witness given of Himself ver. 17, and called by them blasphemy, is true and holy also.

Observe, the discourse here passes into the first person, which was understood before, because he had called himself the Son of God,—but is henceforth used expressly.

31.] This assertion is not to be trifled away by an accommodation, or supposed to be introduced by 'Ye will say to Me:'-see by all means ch. viii. 12 -14 and notes. The words are said in all earnestness, and are strictly true. If such a separation, and independent testimony, as is here supposed, could take place, it would be a falsification of the very conditions of the Truth of God as manifested by the Son, Who being the lóyos, speaks, not of himself, but of the Father. And in this sense ch. viii. 14 is eminently true also, the φωs being the ἀπαύγασμα της δόξης του πατρός. 32.] anlos can, by the inner coherence of the discourse, be no other than THE FATHER, of Whom so much has been said in the former part, but Who is hinted at rather than mentioned in this (πατρός in ver. 30 is spurious). It cannot be John,-from whom (ver. 34) our Lord took not his testimony. Similar modes of alluding to the Father occur ch. viii. 50: see also ch. viii. 18, and Matt. x. 28 and ||. Many interpreters however understand it of John,—Chrysostom, Nonnus, Theophylact, Euthym.:—and lately De Wette has defended the view with some acuteness. But he has certainly missed the inner coherence of the passage. The reason why our Lord mentions John is not 'as ascending from the lesser witness to the greater,' but purposely to remove the idea that He meant

It testifies to the full consciousness on the part of the Son, even in the days of his humiliation, of the righteousness of the Father: and (for the testimony of the Father to the Son is contained in the Scriptures) also to His distinct recognition and approval (Ps. xl. 6-8) of psalm and type and prophecy, as applied to Himself 33. ὁ λύχνος The article has been taken by some (e. g. Bengel, Lücke, Stier) to point to the prophecies concerning John. But we have no passage in the O.T. which designates Elias in such terms. In ref. Sirach we read of him, ανέστη προφήτης ώς πῦρ, καὶ ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ ώς λαμπὰς ἐκαίετο, which Stier thinks may be referred to here. We may, as indeed he also suggests, believe that those words represent or gave rise to a common way of speaking of Elias, as certain Rabbis were called 'The candle of the Law,' &c. (Lightf.) De Wette takes the article as meaning, 'the lamp which was to lead you,' &c.

 α δέδωκεν ἵνα τελ.] See ch.
 xvii. 4 and note. αὐτὰ τὰ ἔργα ᾶ ποιω The repetition is to shew that His life and working was an exact fulfilment of the Father's will. The works which the Father hath given Me to do, those very works which I am doing, 37-39.] The connexion of these verses has been much disputed. I believe it will be found to be this: 'The works of which I have spoken, are only indirect testimonies; the Father Himself, who sent Me, has given direct testimony concerning Me. Now that testimony cannot be derived by you, nor any man, by direct communication with Him; for ye have never heard His voice nor seen His shape. (Or perhaps have not heard His voice, as your fathers did from Sinai,-nor seen His visional appearance, as the Prophets did.) Nor (ver. 38), in your case, has it been given by that inward witness (ch. iii. 33: 1 John iv. 13, 14) which those have (and had in a measure, even before the gift of the Spirit-see inter al., Ps. li. 11) in whom His word abides; for ye have not His word abiding in you, not believing on Him whom He hath sent. Yet (ver. 39) there is a form of this direct testimony of the Father, accessible even to you; 'search the Scriptures,' &c. Chrysostom, Euthymius, Lampe, Bengel, &c., understand φωνή to refer to the voice at our Lord's baptism: but, as Lücke observes, πώποτε forbids this. I may also add that the perfect, ακηκόατε, excludes it. Had reference been to a distinct event, it must have been ἡκούσατε,—and (Lücke) τὴν Observe that the testimony in the Scriptures is not the only, nor the chief one, intended in ver. 37, but (as De Wette well maintains) the direct testi-mony in the heart of the believer;— which, as the Jews have not, they are directed to another form of the Father's testimony, that in the Scriptures.

έραυνατε, either indicative (Cyril, Erasm., Beza, Lampe, Bengel, Kuinoel, Lücke, Tholuck, Olshausen, De Wette), 'Ye search the Scriptures, for ye believe ye have &c., and they are they that testify of Me, and (yet, ver. 40) ye will not come to Me that ye may have life :' or imperative (Chrys., Theophyl., Euthym., August., Luther, Calvin, Wetst., Paulus, Stier), in which case generally a period has been placed after ¿µoù, and a fresh sentence begins at καὶ οὐ θέλ. I believe the imperative sense only will be found to cohere with the previous verses :- see above, where I have given the context. And no other sense will suit the word έραυνατε, which cannot be used, as in the indicative it would be, with blame attached to it,-' ye make nice and frivolous search into the letter of Scripture ;' but, as έξερευν. in ref. Ps., implies a thorough search (see also 1 Pet. i. 11) into the contents and spirit of Scripture. Besides, the emphatic position of ἐραυνᾶτε before τὰs γραφάς, while it does not absolutely necessitate the imper. sense, makes it much more probable than the indic., which would be conveyed by τὰς γρ. ἐραυκᾶτε. Luthardt (ii. 21) remarks, that the almost unanimous verdict of the Greek Fathers (Cyril however is a remarkable exception) for the imper. decides him in its favour.

οτι ύμ. δοκ. \ Ye (emphatic) imagine that in them (emphatic) ye have eternal life (Schöttgen quotes testimonies from the Rubbis: " Qui acquirit sibi verba legis, is acquirit sibi vitam æternam, &c."); -but they, like all other secondary ordinances, have a spiritual end in view, and that end is to testify, from first to last (it is their office, ἐκεῖναί εἰσιν αί μαρτυρούσαι) of ME. 40.7 I would connect these words with the former, and regard them as describing the inconsistency of those who think that they ζωήν έχειν in the Scriptures, and yet will not come to Him of whom they testify, Iva ζωὴν ἔχωσιν. So that καί will be spoken in a fine irony, And ye will not come to Observe, this command to the Jews to search their Scriptures, applies à fortiori to Christians; who are yet, like them, in danger of idolizing a mere written book, believing that in the Bible they have eternal life, and missing the personal knowledge of Him of whom the The οὐ θέλετε Scriptures testify. here sets forth strikingly the freedom of the will, on which the unbeliever's condemnation rests: see ch. iii. 19.

41—44.] The connexion seems to be;—the standing-points of our Lord and of the Jews were not only different, but were inconsistent with and exclusive of one another. He sought not glory from below, from man's praise or report: the Father testified to Him, in all the ways which have been specified; but this testimony they could not receive, nor discover Him in their Scriptures, because human regards and ambition and intrigue had blinded their eyes, and they had not the love of God (the very first command in their law, Deut. vi. 4, 5) in their hearts.

41.] οὐ λαμβ., not merely, 'Ido not desire,' 'non capto,'—but, 'I do not receive;'—'no such praise nor testimony accrues to Me, nor has in Me that on which it can lay hold.' 'My glory is altogether from another source.'

42. ahlá draws forcibly the distinction, setting Himself and them in strong conέγνωκα ύμ.] By long trial and bearing with your manners these many generations; and personally also:-"Hoc radio penetrat corda auditorum." Benaγaπην Luthardt remarks, perhaps refining somewhat too much,την ἀγάπην, because "the love which ye ought to have" is imported: τοῦ θεοῦ-" of (for) your God the God of Israel." So that the words are spoken, not of an ungodly mind in general, but of an absence of that love which God's covenant people should have for Him. "They would none of Jesus: for they were not true Israelites." This love, if they had it, would teach them,-the whole heart, and soul, and mind, and strength being given to God, -to seek honour only from Him, - and thus to appreciate the glory which He hath given to His Son, and His testimony concerning Him. 43.] The first clause is clear. In the latter we have a prophetic declaration regarding the Jews in the latter days. αλλος is in strong contrast with the άλλος of ver. 32. 'The testimony of that Other, who is greater than I, ye will not receive; but if another come in his own name, him ye will receive.' The words are perhaps spoken primarily of the false or Idol-Messiah, the Antichrist, who shall appear in the latter days (2 Thess. ii. 8-12); whose appearance shall be κατ ενεργειαν τοῦ σατανᾶ (their father, ch. viii. 44), ἀποδεικνὺς έαυτὸν ὅτι ἐστὶν θεός, 2 Thess. ii. 4;—and doubtless, in that their final reference, embrace also all the cases in which the Jews have more or less received those false Messiahs who have been foreshadowers of the great Antichrist, and indeed all the cases in which such a spirit has been shewn by them, even in the absence of false Messiahs. 44.] πως δύνασθε (emphatic) is grounded on οὐ θ έλετε—is the consequence of the carnal regards in which they lived. vovtes here implies 'captantes' also. καρὰ τοῦ μόνου θεοῦ, not 'from God only' (E. V. and De Wette), which is ungrammatical (requiring μόνου to be either afler θεοῦ, see Matt. iv. 4; xii. 4; xvii. 8, or before τοῦ θεοῦ, Luke v. 21; vi. 4: Heb. ix. 7. Lücke); but from the only God: in contradistinction to the idolatry of the natural heart, which is ever setting up for itself other sources of ever setting up for itself other sources of honour, worshipping man, or self,—or even, as in the case alluded to in the last verse, Satan,-instead of God. The words τοῦ μόνου θεοῦ are very important, because they form the point of passage to the next verses; in which the Jews are accused of not believing the writings of Moses, the very pith and kernel of which was the unity of God, and the having no other gods but Him. 45.] The work of Christ is not κατηγορείν, even as He is Judge; -but kpivew, by the appointment of the Father. And therefore-though He has said so much of the unbelief of the Jews, and charged them in the last verse with breach of the central law of God-He will not accuse them; nay, it is not needful; -for Moses, whom they disbelieved, while vainly hoping in him (see above on ver. 39),έπαναπαυόμενοι νόμφ, Rom. ii. 17,already accused them: see Deut. xxxi. 21, 26, and ch. vii. 19. former part of this verse should not be rendered as in E.V. had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me;' but if ye believed Moses, ye would believe me. The imperfects render this necessary: the other rendering would require aorists. περὶ ἐμοῦ ἔγραψεν—"nus-quam non." Bengel. This is an important testimony by the Lord to the subject of the whole Pentateuch;—it is περὶ ἐμοῦ. It is also a testimony to the fact, of Moses having written those books, which were then, and are still, known by 47.] γράμμασιν here does mot, in the sense, = γραφαῖς: for τ αῖς ἐκείνου γραφαῖς could not be used;—the γραφή being ἡ θεία γραφή, not (ἡ τ οῦ) Μωυσέως γραφή,—but the γράμματα were those of Moses; the outward expression of the γραφή,—the letters, and words, as found on paper:-just as the βήματα in the other case are the outward expression of the λόγος. The meaning is: men give greater weight to what is written and published, the letter of a book, than to mere word of mouth ;-and ye in particular give greater honour to Moses, than to Me: if then ye believe not what he has written, which comes down to you hallowed by the reverence of ages, -how can you believe the words which are uttered by Me, to whom you are hostile?' This however is not all :-Moses leads to Christ :- is one of the witnesses by which the Father hath testified of Him: 'if then ye have rejected the eneans, how shall ye reach the end?' 'If your unbelief has stopped the path, how shall ye arrive at Him to whom it leads?' Meyer is quite right in maintaining that the opposition does not lie between γράμμασιν and δήμασιν, but between εκείνου and τοῖς έμοῖς. Those who can, έκείνου and τοις έμοις. should by all means consult Stier, whose exposition of the above important discourse is very elaborate and valuable:-Reden Jesu, vol. iv. pp. 170-233, 2nd edn.

CHAP. VI. JESUS THE LIFE IN THE FLESH. 1—15.] Miraculous feeding of five thousand men. Matt. xiv. 13—21. Mark vi. 30—44. Luke ix. 10—17. in order of which the state of the st 17,-in each of which compare the notes throughout. Here we have another example of John relating a miracle with the view of introducing a discourse, and that discourse carries on the testimony of Jesus to Himself. In the last, He was the Son of God, testified to by the Father, received by faith, rejected by unbelief: here He is son of MAN, the incarnate Life of the world, and we have the unbelief of the Jews and His own disciples set in strong contrast with the feeding on and participating in Him as the Bread of Life. 1.] μετά ταῦτα gives us no fixed date: see on ch. v. 1. As Lücke remarks, the ἀπηλθ. πέραν της Oak. . . . , if connected with the preceding discourse, would be unintelligible,-and can only be understood by the fragmentary character of this Gospel as relates to mere narration, and the wellknown fact being presupposed, that His Ministry principally took place in Galilee.

Matt. gives this passage over the lake in connexion with the execution of John the Baptist : Mark and Luke, with the return of the Twelve from their mission. (The Twelve were probably gathered, or their gathering finished, in the interval since ch. v. 47, during which time their mission also had taken place.)

της Γ'. της Τιβ.] The last appellation is probably inserted for the sake of Gentile readers, to whom it was best known by that name: thus Pausan. v. 7. 3, αὐτὸς οἶδα Ἰόρδανον λίμνην Τιβερίδα ὀνομαζομένην διοδεύοντα: but it was more usually called, as by Josephus, Γεννησάρ or Γεννησαρίτις, 1 Macc. xi. 67: Strabo xvi. 2 (Ptolem. v. 15, Lücke). Tiβ. cannot mean that He came from Tiberias, however true that may have been. That would have been ἀπὸ or ἐκ Τιβεριάdos. It is possible, though not likely, that της Τιβ. may have been a gloss, and have found its way into the text very early. But at all events we must not adopt the reading of D &c., είς τὰ μέρη τ. Τίβ.,-for the fact was just otherwise: compare vv. 2 and 23. 2.] It is evident from this that a circuit in Galilee and works of healing are presupposed (see Matt. ver. 13: Mark, ver. 33: Luke, ver. 11). 3.] To opos, perhaps 'the hill country'

account, not for so great a multitude coming to Him, but perhaps (?) for the circumstance that the people at that time were gathered in multitudes, ready to set out on their journey to Jerusalem. We must remember also that the reference of the following discourse to the Passover being so pointed, the remark would naturally be here inserted by the Evangelist: but I would not, with Luthardt (i. 80; ii. 41) insist on this as the only reason for his making it. 5.] Here there is considerable difficulty, on account of the variation from Matt., Mark, and Luke, who relate that the disciples came to the Lord after He had been teaching and healing the multitudes, and when it was now evening,-and asked him to dismiss the multitudes, that they might buy food; -whereupon He commanded, 'Give ye them to eat;'-whereas here apparently, on their first coming, the Lord Himself suggests the question, how they were to be fed, to Philip. This difference is not to be passed over, as it has usually been by English Commentators, without notice. Still less are we to invent improbable and hardly honest harmonistic shifts to piece the two narratives together. There can be no doubt, fairly and honestly speaking, that the narratives, in their mere letter. disagree. But those who are not slaves to the mere letter will see here that inner and deeper accordance of which Augustine (De Consensu Evang. ii. 46, vol. iii. pt. i.) speaks in commenting on this passage: "Ex qua universa varietate verborum, rerum autem sententiarumque concordia, satis apparet salubriter nos doceri, mhil quærendum in verbis nisi loquentium voluntatem; cui demonstrandæ invigilare debent omnes veridici narratores, cum de homine vel de angelo vel de Deo aliquid narrant." I repeat the remark so often made in this Commentary,-that if we were in possession of the facts as they happened, there is no doubt that the various forms of the literal narrations would fall into their places, and the truthfulness of each historian would be apparent :- but as we cannot at present reconcile them in this way, the humble and believing Christian will not be tempted to handle the word of God deceitfully, but to admire the gracious condescension which has given us the evidence of so many independent witnesses, whose very difference in detail makes their accordance in the great central truths so much the more weighty. On every point of importance here, the four sacred historians are entirely and absolutely agreed. That every minor detail related by them had its ground in historical fact, we fully believe; it is the tracking it to this ground in each case, which is now beyond our power; and here comes in the simplicity and reliance of faith: and the justification of those who believe and receive each Gospel as they find it written. πρὸς Φ.] Why to Philip, does not appear; perhaps some reason lay in the πειράζων αὐτόν, which is now lost to us. From his words in ch. xiv. 8, we cannot infer, as has been done by Chrys. (Hom. xlii. 1, in Joann. vol. viii. p. 249) and others, that he was weaker in faith, or tardier in spiritual apprehension, than the rest. Of all the Apostles who appear in the sacred narrative, something might be quoted shewing equal unreadiness to believe and understand. I would take the circumstance as simple matter of fact, implying perhaps that Philip was nearest to our Lord at the moment. We must not fall into the mistake of supposing that Philip being of Bethsaida the city of Andrew and Peter (ch. i. 45) throws any light on the question: for the Bethsaida near which our Lord now was, Luke ix. 10, was another whence—'from what store.' Hence Philip's answer.

-by this St. John must be knew: -by this St. John must be understood not only to rescue our Lord from the imputation of asking counsel of Philip, but

8. Meyer remarks, that είs ἐκ τῶν μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ may seem strange, seeing that Philip also was this: but that it has its pragmatic value, seeing that, Philip having been asked in vain, one from among the circle of the disciples answers, and is afterwards specified as having been In the three other Gospels, the loaves and fishes appear as the disciples' own ;-and we have thus a very simple but very instructive instance of the way in which differences in detail arose. They were their own,—but not till they had bought them. 9.] Kpt-Olvous, the usual barley bread of the lower but of later Greek usage :- at first used to signify any thing subsidiary to bread as a relish, such as meat of all kinds, and condiments. Later however, from fish being, in the deeply coast-indented country of Greece, the most common animal food, it came to be applied to that alone or principally—(see art. Opsonium in the Dictionary of Gr. and Rom. Antiquities).

10.] χόρτος πολύς, in accordance with the time of year, the latter end of spring, after the rainy season. On avaneoeiv see Mark and Luke, who describe the οί ἄνδρες This is a particular touch of accuracy in the account of an eye-witness which has not I think been noticed. Why in the other accounts should mention be made only of the men in numbering them? Matt. has, it is true, χωρίς γυν. κ. παιδ., leaving it to be inferred that there was some means of distinguishing; -the others merely give [ωsel] ανδρες πεντακιςχ. without any explanation. But here we see how it came to be so-the men alone were arranged in companies, or alone arranged so that any account was taken of them: the women and children being served promiscuously; who indeed, if the multitude were a paschal caravan (?), or parts of many such, would not be likely to be very numerous; - and here again we have a point of minute truthfulness brought out.

11.] On the process of the miracle, see notes on Matt. John describes the διάδοσιs as being the act of the Lord Himself, and leaves the intervention of the disciples to be understood.

ευχαριστήσας here answers to εὐλόγησεν in the other Gospels. It was the 'grace' of the father of the family; perhaps the ordinary one in use among the Jews. John seems to connect with it the idea brought out by Luke, εὐλ. αὐτούς, i. e. 12.] Pecuτους άρτους: see ver. 23. liar to John. The command, one end of which was certainly to convince the disciples of the power which had wrought the miracle, is given by our Lord a moral bearing also. They collected the fragments for their own use, each in his κόφινος, the ordinary furniture of the travelling Jew ("quorum cophinus fænum-que supellex," Juv. Sat. iii. 14), to carry his food, lest he should be polluted by that of the people through whose territory he passed: see note on Matt. xv. 32. Observe, that here the 12 baskets are filled with the fragments of the bread alone:

but in Mark, with those of the fishes also. We must not altogether miss the reference to the twelve tribes of Israel, typifying the Church which was to be fed with the bread of life to the end of time. 14.] On δ προφ. see note on ch.

Matt. xiv. 22-33. Mark vi. 45-52. Omitted by Luke. An important and interesting question arises, Why is this miracle here inserted by St. John? That he ever inserts for the mere purpose of narration, I cannot believe. The reason seems to me to be this: to give to the Twelve, in the prospect of so apparently strange a discourse respecting His Body, a view of the truth respecting that Body, that it and the things said of it were not to be understood in a gross corporeal, but in a supernatural and spiritual sense. And their very terror, and reassurance, tended to impress that confidence in Him which kept them firm, when many left Him, ver. 66. 16.] δψία, here, will be during the time between the δψία of Matt. xiv. 15, and that of ib. ver. 23. [The Jews commonly reckoned two evenings: see the introductory note on Matt. xxvi. 17-19.] κατέβησαν-by the command of Jesus (Matt., Mark). ήρχοντο-denoting the unfinished actionthey were making for the other side of the sea, in the direction of Capernaum; πρὸς Βηθσαϊδάν, Mark, which would be the same thing. It would appear as if the disciples were lingering along shore with the expectation of taking in Jesus: but night had fallen, and He had not come to them, and the sea began to be stormy (ver. 18).

Having therefore (ov) set out (ver. 19). and rowed, &c. The our seems to me to render this supposition necessary,-to bind their having rowed twenty-five or thirty stadia, with the fact that the Lord had not come, and it was dark, and the sea swelling into a storm. The lake is (Jos. B. J. iii. 10.7) forty stadia wide: so that, as we can hardly assume the passage to have been to a point directly opposite, they were somewhere about μέσον τῆς θαλάσσης, Matt. ver. 24. 18.] διεγείρετο, was becoming thoroughly agitated: was rising.

19-21. περ. ἐπὶ τῆς θαλ. There surely can be no question in the mind of an unprejudiced reader, that it is John's intention to relate a miracle;—nor again, -that there could be in the minds of the disciples no doubt about that miracle,no chance of a mistake as to what they saw. I have treated of ἐπὶ τῆς θαλ. on Matthew, ver. 25. They were afraid: -but upon being reassured by His voice, they were willing to take Him into the ship; and upon their doing so, the ship in a comparatively short time (or perhaps immediately, by miracle, but I prefer the other) was at the land to which they had been going, viz. by the storm ceasing, and the ship making smooth way (ἐκόπασεν ὁ ἄνεμος, Matt., Mark). seems to me that the above interpretation of ήθελον οῦν λαβεῖν is absolutely necessary to account for the οῦν, and quite in accordance with John's usage of θέλω (see reff.). Some of the German Commentators (even De Wette among them) have created a difficulty, by strangely rendering ήθελον, 'they wished' (implying, 'but did not'), but (καί) the ship was immediately, &c.—i. e. they were already close to the land, and so there was no occasion. Prof. Bleek (Beiträge, pp. 103-4) half adopts this view:—adding to it, I am sorry to see, that perhaps Jesus was on the land, and the disciples in the storm and darkness thought Him to be on the sea.

22-59.] The multitudes follow Jesus to Capernaum, where, in the synagogue, He discourses to them on Himself as the Bread of Life. 22-24.] These verses are involved and parenthetical in construction, but very characteristic of the minute care with which the Evangelist will account for every circumstance which is essential to his purpose in the narrative. o oxlos] We are not to understand the whole multitude who were fed,—but that portion of them which had remained on the coast over the night. Many had probably dispersed to the villages about, or perhaps taken up their night quarters more inland.

Then the ηλθεν afterwards, belonging to the same set of facts, is in the same tense, but not pluperfect: came, not 'had come.' The πλοιάρια had perhaps brought some of them thither; or the spot έγγυς τ. τόπου, &c. might have been some landing-place of merchandise. 25.] πέραν τ. θαλ. is now the west bank; -we have been crossing the sea with the multitude. πότε, as Stier remarks, includes mas in its meaning. because it was not for a sign to these people that He had miraculously crossed the lake.

26. The seeking Him, on the part of these people,-to Him, who saw the hearts,-was merely a low desire to profit by His wonderful works, -not a reasonable consequence of deduction from His miracles that He was the Saviour of the world. And from this low desire of mere satisfaction of their carnal appetite, He takes occasion in the following discourse to raise them to spiritual desire after HIMSELF, THE BREAD OF LIFE. The discourse forms a parallel with that in ch. iv. έργάζ., imperative : another instance of the construction which I have advocated in ch. The E. V., 'Labour not for,' does not give the sense of $\epsilon \rho \gamma \delta \zeta$. They had not laboured in this case for the $\beta \rho \hat{\omega} \sigma is \hat{a} \pi o \lambda \lambda \nu \mu \epsilon \nu \eta$, but it had been furnished miraculously. A better rendering would be, Busy not yourselves about,— Do not weary yourselves for, -which they were doing, by thus coming after our Lord: [but best of all Work not for: so as to preserve the connexion between verses 27, 29, 30.] την απολλ. works well pleasing to God. 29.7 The meaning is not, - that faith is wrought in us by God, is the work of God; but that the truest way of working the work of God is to believe on Him whom He hath έργον, not έργα, because there is but this one, properly speaking, and all the rest are wrapt up in it (see James i. This is a most important saying of our Lord, as containing the germ of that teaching afterwards so fully expanded in the writings of Paul. "I know not," says Schleiermacher (cited by Stier, iv. 231, edn. 2), "where we can find any passage, even in the writings of the Apostles, which says so clearly and significantly, that all eternal 'life in men proceeds from nothing else than faith in Christ." 30, 31.] This answers to ch. iv. 12, 'Art thou greater than our father Jacob,' &c. It is spoken in unbelief and opposition; not, as many have supposed, as a request for the Bread or Life, meaning it by the sign, but in the ordinary sign-seeking spirit of the Jews. Stier says well, "They have been hesitating between better and worse thoughts, till at last unbelief prevails." The σημείον here demanded is the sign from heaven, the proof of the sealing by God; such a proof would be, in their estimation, compared with His present miracles, as the manna (bread from heaven) was, compared to the multiplied loaves and fishes. manna was extolled by the Jews as the greatest miracle of Moses. Josephus calls it θείον καὶ παράδοξον βρῶμα: see also Wisd. xvi. 20, 21. "They forgot that their fathers disbelieved Moses almost from the

and that the Psalm from which they quote most strongly sets forth this; -that they despised the manna, and preferred ordinary meat to it." Stier. Observe our Lord's $\pi \iota \sigma \tau$. ϵ ls and their $\pi \iota \sigma \tau$. $\sigma \circ \iota$. The former, the casting their whole hopes and faith on Him, is what He requires: but they will not even give the latter, common credence, to Him. Their τί ἐργάζη; Meyer remarks, is a retort of our Lord's command, ver. 27. There is no σύ expressed, but the stress is on the Tí. 32.7 Our Lord lays open the course of their argument. They have not mentioned Moses,-nor was the giving of the manna a miracle performed by Moses; -- but He knew that the comparison between Moses and Himself was in their minds, and answers by exposing the error which represented Moses as the giver of the manna. Neither again was that the true bread from heaven. It was, in one sense, bread from heaven;—but not in this sense. It was a type and shadow of the true bread from heaven, which My Father is giving (δίδωσιν,—or perhaps the abstract present,—giveth) to you. Our Lord does not here deny, but asserts the miraculous character of the manna. άρτος του θεου = δ άρτος δν δίδωσιν δ πατήρ μου. The words δ καταβ. are the predicate of δ άρτος, and do not apply, in the construction of this verse, to Christ personally, however truly they apply to Him in fact. The E. V. is here wrong: it should be, The bread of God is till ver. 35 does Jesus first say, 'I AM the bread of life.' The manna is still kept in view—ὅταν κατέβη ἡ δρόσος κατέβαινεν τὸ μάννα ἐπ' αὐτῆς, Num. xi. 9. And the present participle, here used in reference to the manua, is dropped when the Lord Himself is spoken of: see vv. 38, 41, 58, and especially the distinction between ver. 50 and ver. 51 (so Lücke, De 34.] Ch. iv. Wette, Stier, Benge!). 15 is exactly parallel. The Jews understand this bread, as the Samaritan woman understood the water, to be some miraculous kind of sustenance which would bestow life everlasting :- perhaps they thought of the heavenly manna, which the Rabbis speak of as prepared for the just in the future world: see quotations in Lücke, ii. 132, also Rev. ii. 17. πάντοτε, emphatic:-not now only, but always.

35.7 As in ch. v. 30, so here, our Lord passes from the indirect to the direct form of speech. Henceforward it is 'I,' 'Me,' throughout the discourse.

In the genitive της ζωής is implied δ καταβάς ἐκ τοῦ οὐρ. καὶ ζωὴν διδοὺς τῷ κόσμφ. So ΰδωρ ζων in ch. iv.

On the assurance of never hungering or thirsting, see note at ch. iv. 14. It is possible that our Lord placed the all-satisfying bread of life in contrast to the manna, which was no sooner given, Exod. xvi., than the people began to thirst, Exod. xvii.;but I would not lay any stress on this. ὁ ἐρχόμ. πρ. ἐμέ is in the same sense as in ch. v. 40-that of acceptance of and faith in Him. 36.] είπον ὑμιν-πότε δὲ τοῦτο εἶπεν αὐτοῖς; εἰκὸς τοῦτο ρη-θῆναι μὲν μὴ γραφῆναι δέ. Euthym. But perhaps, as Euthym, himself seems to suggest, and as Lücke and De Wette are inclined to think, the reference may be toch. v. 37-44, and the built may be said generally. Stier and others think that ver. 26 is referred to: but this is far-fetched. We have instances of reference to sayings not recorded, in ch. x. 26; xii. 34. ράκατέ με] 'Ye have seen the true Bread. from heaven, the σημείον greater than the manna, even Me Myself: and yet have not believed. 37.] The whole body of believers on Christ are spoken of by Him, hereand in ch. xvii., as given to Him by the Father. But Bengel's observation is very important: "mav-vocula momentosissima, et, collatis iis quæ sequuntur, consideratu dignissima. Namin sermonibus Jesu Christi, quod Pater ipsi dedit, id, et singulari numero et neutro genere, appellatur omne; qui ad ipsum, Filium, veniunt, ii masculino genere vel etiam plurali numero describuntur, -omnis, vel illi. Pater Filiototam quasi massam dedit, ut omnes quos dedit unum sint; id universum Filius singulatim evolvit, in exsecutione. Hinc illud in xvii. 2, ut omne quod dedisti ei, det eis vitam æternam." See also 1 John v. 4. See further on παν δ δίδωσίν μοι δ πατήρ, οὐ μη ἐκβ. έξω does not refer here to the office of the Son of God as Judge; but is another way of expressing the grace and readiness with which He will receive all who come to Him.

capricious, nor even of His own arbitrary choice; but as He came into the world to do the Father's will, and-that will is that all who come to Him by faith-shall have life, so He receives all such ;-loses none of them; -and will raise them all up (here, in the fullest and blessed sense) at the last day. (ἀπολέσω again is not 'destroy,' 'condemn,' but lose: see ch. xii. 25; xvii. 12. Ίνα μη έξ έμης αίτίας ἀπόληταί τις, Euthym.) Olshausen remarks, that "in ch. iv. we had only the inexhaustible refreshing of the soul by the water of life; but this discourse goes further; -that not even death itself shall destroy the body of him who has been nourished by this bread of life" (ii. 167). ἀναστήσω refers to the only resurrection which is the completion of the man in his glorified state; —it does not set aside the araoraous rpl- $\sigma \epsilon \omega s$, but that very term is a debasement of ανάστασις: its true sense is only ανάστασις ζωής. Bengel has beautifully given the connexion of this last promise with what went before: "hic finis est, ultra quem periculum nullum." But there is much more than this in it. In this declaration (vv. 39, 40) is contained the key of the following discourse, vv. 41-59.

The end of the work of God, as regards man, is the glorification of his restored and sanctified nature,-body, soul, and spirit,-in eternity. Without this,-salvation, restitution, would be incomplete. The adoption cannot be consummated without the redemption of the body. Rom. viii. 18-23. And the glorification of the body, soul, and spirit,-of the whole man, -cannot take place but by means of the glorified Body of the second Adam. "He who does not see this, will never understand either the Holy Communion, or this testimony of the Lord in its inner meaning." Stier, iv. 243, edn. 2. θεωρών here is a different thing from the mere ôpav of ver. 36. It is the awakening of the attention preparatory to faith, answering to the looking on the serpent of brass: τοις ὀφθαλμοίς της ψυχης, Euthym.; but afterwards he makes the $\theta \epsilon \omega \rho \epsilon \hat{\imath} \nu =$ $\pi \iota \sigma \tau \epsilon \dot{\nu} \epsilon \iota \nu$, to which it is only preparatory.

41. Not different hearers, nor does the scene of the discourse here change: they were the same,-perhaps the principal among them, the official superintendents of the synagogue :- for John generally uses of loudator in this official 42.] They rightly supposed that this καταβήναι ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ must imply some method of coming into the world diverse from ordinary generation. Meyer gathers from the οἴδαμεν, that our Lord's reputed father was then still alive. But surely the verb will bear the sense of knowing as matter of fact who they were, and need not be confined to personal 43.] Our Lord does not answer their objection, because it lay far from His present purpose to disclose aught of those mysteries which the answer must have indicated. It was not till the faith of the apostolic Christians was fully fixed on Him as the Son of God, and the outline of the doctrine of His Person was firmly sketched out, that the Spirit brought out those historical records which assure us of His supernatural conception (see Nitzsch, cited by Stier, iv. 244, edn. 2). The connexion seems to be this: They were not to murinur among themselves because He had said this; for the right understanding of what He had said is only to be gained by being taught of God, by being drawn by the Father, who alone can give the desire to come to Christ, and bring a man to Him. That this 'drawing is not irresistible grace, is confessed even by Augustine himself, in his Tractatus on this passage. "Si trahitur, ait aliquis, invitus venit. Si invitus venit, nec credit: si non credit, nec venit. Non enim ad Christum ambulando currimus, sed eredendo; nec motu corporis sed voluntate cordis accedimus. . . . Noli te cogitare invitum trahi; trahitur animus et amore." And just before; "Intrare quisquam ecclesiam potest nolens, accedere ad altare potest nolens, accipere sacramentum potest nolens :- credere non potest, nisi volens." He quotes, "trahit sua quemque voluptas" (Virg. Ecl. ii. 65), to shew that the drawing is that of delight and choice, not of obligation and necessity. Calvin (?), Beza, and Lampe understand irresistible grace to be here meant: "Falsum est et profanum, non nisi volentes trahi" (Calv., Lücke, ii. 144 note). The Greek expositors, Cyril, Chrysostom, Euthymius, Theophylact, take the view which I have adopted above. Chrysostom says, & kal αὐτὸ οὐ τὸ ἐφ' ἡμῖν ἀναίρει, ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον έμφαίνει ήμας βοηθείας δεομένους. See Article X. of the Church of England, in This drawing towards Christ fine. may be exemplified in the legal dispensation, which was to the Jews a παιδαγωγία είς χριστόν. It now is being exerted on all the world,-in accordance with the Lord's prophecy ch. xii. 32 (see note there), and His command Matt. xxviii. 19, 20,by Christian preaching and missions; but, after all, the individual will must be turned to Christ by the Father, Whose covenanted promise is, that He will so turn it in answer to prayer. "Nondum: traheris? ora ut traharis" (Augustine, ut supra). The same solemn and joyous refrain, as Meyer well calls it, follows, as in vv. 39, 40. 45.] ἐν τοῖς προφ. may be a general form of citation

(Mark i. 2: Acts vii. 42; xiii. 40), or may mean that the sense is found in several places of the prophets: see besides reff., Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. This clearly intimates the kind of drawing meant in the last verse;—the opening the eyes of the mind by divine teaching. ἀκούσας κ. μαθών is an expansion of διδακτός. ἔρχ. πρός με This is the final decision of the human will, acted on by the divine attraction to Christ. The beginning is, the Father draws him: the progress, he hears and learns-here is the consenting will-'Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth:'— the end, he cometh to Christ—here is the will acting on the whole man.

46.] The connexion is: the mention of ἀκούσας παρὰ τοῦ πατρός might lead them to think of a personal communication from the Father to each man, and thus the necessity of the mission of the Son might be invalidated. This was the only way in which a Jew could misunderstand ver. 45; he could not dream of a seeing of the Father with bodily eyes.

ό ῶν παρὰ τ. θεοῦ is Jesus Himself: see ch. vii. 29. His knowledge of the Father is complete and immediate; ours, partial, and derived through Him 47.7 Our Lord now recurs to the subject of their murmurs, and gives the answer for which He has been preparing the way, repeating nearly ver. 40, and adding, 48.] If so, (see ver. 47,) there is full reason for my naming Myself the Bread of Life. 49.] That bread from heaven had no power to keep off death, and that, death owing to unbelief: -our Lord by thus mentioning of marépes ύμων and their death, certainly hints at the similar unbelief of these Jews. And the same dubious sense of ἀποθάνη prevails in ver. 50. Death is regarded as being swallowed up in the glory of the resurrection, and the second death-which was hidden in the former ἀπέθανον—has over him who eats this Bread of Life, no power: nay, he is brought, even here, into a resurrection state from sin and death: see Rom. vi. init. and Col. iii. init. 51.] o Zw, containing life in itself, not merely supplying the waste of life with lifeless matter: see on ch. iv. 13, 14. артоз] From this time we hear no more of ἄρτος: this figure is dropped, and the reality takes its place.

difficult questions arise regarding the sense and reference of this saying of our Lord. (1) Does it refer to HIS DEATH? and, (2) is there any reference to the ORDINANCE OF THE LORD'S SUPPER?

(1) In treating this question I must at once reject all metaphorical and sideinterpretations, as, that the teaching of Christ is the Bread, and to be taught by Him is feeding upon it (so Grotius, and the modern rationalists): that the divine Nature of Christ, or His sending of the Holy Spirit, or His whole life of doing good on earth, can be meant: all such have against them the plain sense of the words, which, as Stier observes, are very simple ordinary words; the only difficulty arising, when we come to enquire into their application to His own Person. The Bread of Life is Himself: and, strictly treated, when we come to enquire what, of that body, soul, and spirit, which constituted Himself, this Bread specifically is, we have His answer that it is His Flesh which He will give (for this will be the meaning, whether the words ην έγω δώσω are to be regarded as part of the text or not) on behalf of the life of the world. We are then specifically directed to His Flesh as the answer. Then, what does Flesh as the answer. Then, what does that Flesh import? The flesh of animals is the ordinary food of men; but not the blood. The blood, which is the life, is spilt at death, and is not in the flesh when eaten by us. Now this distinction must be carefully borne in mind. The flesh here, (see ver. 53,) and the eating of the flesh, are distinct from the blood, and the drinking of the blood. We have no generalities merely, to interpret as we please: but the terms used are precise and technical. It is then only through or after the Death of the Lord, that by any propriety of language, His Flesh could be said Then another distinction to be eaten. must be remembered: The flesh of animals which we eat is dead flesh. It is already the prey of corruption; we eat it, and die (vor. 49). But this Bread is living Bread; not dead flesh, but living Flesh. And therefore manducation by the teeth materially is not to be thought of here; but some kind of eating by which the living Fiesh of the Son of God is made the living sustenance of those who partake of it. Now His Flesh and Blood were sundered by Death. Death was the shedding of His precious Blood, which He did not afterwards resume: see ch. xx. 27, and Luke xxiv. 39. His Flesh is the glorified substance of His Resurrection-Body, now at the right hand of God. It is then in His Resurrection form only that His Flesh can be eaten, and be living food for the living man. I cannot therefore see how any thing short of His Death can be here meant. By that Death, He has given His Flesh for the life of the world: not merely that they who believe on Him may, in the highest sense, have life; but that δ κόσμος may have life The very existence of all the created world is owing to, and held together by, that Resurrection-Body of the Lord. In Him all things are gathered together and reconciled to God: τὰ πάντα ἐν αὐτῷ συνέστηκεν, Col. i. 17. (2) The question whether there is here any reference to the ORDINANCE OF THE LORD'S SUPPER, has been inaccurately put. When cleared of inaccuracy in terms, it will mean, Is the subject here dwelt upon, the same as that which is set forth in the ordinance of the Lord's Supper? And of this there can surely be no doubt. To the ordinance itself, there is here no reference; nor could there well have been But the spiritual verity which underlies the ordinance is one and the same with that here insisted on; and so considered, the discourse is, as generally treated, most important towards a right understanding of the ordinance. the history of the exegesis of this passage, see Lücke ii. pp. 149-159 (3rd edn.), and Excursus ii., in his 2nd edn. (omitted in his 3rd) ;-also Tholuck and Olshausen, in loc. To attempt to recount the various opinions, would exceed the limits of a note in an edition of the whole Testament: for the present subject is one in which the manifold dogmatical variations of individual belief have influenced Commentators to such an extent as to render accurate classification impossible. I may roughly state, that three leading opinions may be traced: that of those who hold (a) that no reference to the Holy Communion is intended,-among whom are Origen and Basil, of the ancients; and of the moderns, the Swiss Reformers, Zwingle and Calvin (the former however not very decidedly, see Olsh. ii. 173 note), Luther, Melanchthon. (B) That the whole passage regards exclusively the Holy Communion, -among whom are Chrysostom, Cyril, Theophylact, Euthymius, the Schoolmen, and the Roman Catholic expositors, with a few exceptions. (7) That the subject and idea of the Holy Communion, not the ordinance is referred to: to which class belong the best modern Commentators in Germany, e.g. Lücke, Tholuck, Olshausen, Stier. Bengel's note to the same effect is important: "Jesus verba sua scienter ita formavit, ut statim et semper illa quidem de spirituali fruitione sui agerent proprie; sed posthac eadem consequenter etiam in augustissimum S. Cœnæ anysterium, quum id institutum foret, convenirent. Etenim ipsam rem hoc sermone propositam in S. Cœnam contulit; tantique hoc sacramentum est momenti, ut facile existimari possit, Jesum, ut proditionem Judæ ver. 71, et mortem suam hoc versu, ita etiam S. Cœnam, de qua inter hæc verba certissime secum cogitavit, uno ante anno prædixisse, ut discipuli possent prædictionis postea recordari. Tota hæc de carne et sanguine J. C. oratio Passionem spectat, et cum ea S. Cœnam. Hinc separata carnis et sanguinis mentio constanter. Nam in passione sanguis ex corpore eductus est, Agnusque mactatus." 52.] The 52.] The inference conveyed in payeir, which first comes from the Jews themselves, is yet a right one. If He is the Bread, and that Bread is His Flesh, we must eat His Flesh, though not in the sense here meant by them. They contended against one another, probably some having more insight into the possibility of a spiritual 53.] Our meaning than others. Lord not only ratifies their payeir, but adds to it a more wonderful thing; that they must also do that against which a prohibition might seem to have existed from Noah downwards, -drink His Blood. But observe, this Blood is not to be eaten in the Flesh, which was the forbidden thing (Gen. ix. 4: Levit. xvii. 10-16), in its strict literal form: but to be drunk, separate from the flesh: again presupposing death. Now as the Flesh of Christ (see above) is the Resurrection-Body which He now has, and in which all things consist: so is His Blood ("the blood is the life." Levit. xvii. 11, 14) the Life which He gave up, paid down, as the penalty for the sin of the world. By the shedding, pouring forth, of that Blood, is remission It is quite impossible that these words should, as De Wette maintains, be merely an expansion of την σάρκα φαγείν. Even had the idea of τὸ αίμα πίνειν been one familiar to the Jews, the construction would not have allowed such an interpretation; -but new as it was, and abhorrent from their habits and law, we must regard it as specially and purposely But what is this eating and added. drinking? Clearly, not merely faith: for faith answers to the hand reached forth for the food, - but is not the act of eating. Faith is a necessary condition of the act: so that we can hardly say with Augustine, "crede, et manducasti;" but 'crede et manducabis.' Inasmuch as Faith will necessarily in its energizing lead to this partaking, we sometimes incorrectly say that it is Faith :- but for strict accuracy this is not enough. To eat the flesh of Christ, is to realize, in our inward life, the mystery of His Body now in heaven, -to digest and assimilate our own portion in that Body. To drink His Blood, is to realize, in our inward life, the mystery of His satisfaction for sin,-to digest and assimilate our own portion in that satisfaction, the outpouring of that Blood. And both these definitions may be gathered into one, which is: The eating of His

Flesh and drinking of His Blood import the making to ourselves and using as objectively real, those two great Truths of our Redemption in Him, of which our Faith subjectively convinces us.

And of this realizing of Faith He has been pleased to appoint certain symbols in the Holy Communion, which He has commanded to be received; to signify to us the spiritual process, and to assist us towards it. οὐκ ἔχ. ζωὴν ἐν ἑαυτ.] 'Ye have not in you that spring of life, which shall overcome death, and lead (ver. 54) to the resurrection in the true sense: see above, ver. 44, and notice again the solemn τρώγων It is not necessary to see any more literal 'eating' in the word than in φαγών:-it expresses the present of φαγών, which must be either τρώγων or ἐσθίων,—and the real sense conveyed is, that by the very act of inward realization, which is the 'manducatio,' the possession of eternal life is certified.

55.] $\delta\lambda\eta\theta\eta$ s is here not $= \dot{\eta} \delta\lambda\eta\theta\nu\eta$, nor is the sense, 'My Flesh is the true meat &c.,' but My flesh is true meat, i. e. really to be faten, which they doubted. Thus $\delta\lambda\eta\theta\bar{\omega}$ s is a gloss, which falls short of the depth of the adjective. This verse is decisive against all explaining away or metaphorizing the passage. Food and drink are not here mere metaphors;—rather are our common material food and drink mere shadows and imperfect types of this only real reception of refreshment and nourishment into the being. 56.] He who thus lives upon Me, abides in Me (see ch. xv. 5 and note);—and I (that living power and nourishment conveyed by the $\&aros \ \tau \eta s$ &archings which = &archings &archings which = &archings abide in him. Beware of imagining, as Bp. Wordsw. again (see note on Matt. xvi. 18), that there is any especial emphasis on μ ov because of its position. 57.] The same expanded further—see ch. v. 26. The two branches of the feeding on Christ are now united under the general expression, $\tau \rho \omega \gamma_{\mu\nu} \gamma_{\mu\nu} \gamma_{\mu\nu}$

Siá expresses the efficient cause. The Father is the Fountain of all Life: the Son lives in and by the Father: and all created being generally, lives (in the lower sense) in and by Him; but he that cateth Him shall (eternally and in the highest sense) live by Him. Ver. 58 forms the solemn conclusion of the discourse, referring back to the Bread with which it began and to its difference from the perishable food which they had extolled:—and setting forth the infinite superiority of its effects over those of that sustenance.

60.] Lampe shews by reff. and other citations that $\sigma \kappa \lambda \eta \rho \delta s$ "non tam absurditatem quam impietatem designat." It seems clear that it was not the difficulty, so much as the strangeness of the saying, which scandalized them. It is the whole discourse,-the turn given to it, -the doctrine of the Bread of Life,-the giving His Flesh and Blood to eat,-at which they take offence. ἀκούειν, to which they take offence. Accounty, to listen to it—'Who can stay and hear such sayings as this?' not, 'to understand it.' 61.] èv è aut ϕ , by His divine knowledge. 62.] è à v o v θ e ω p., what then, if ye see . . . not meaning 'will ye not then be much more scandalized?' or, 'what will is the second of ye say (or do), then?'-but appealing to an event which they should witness, as a certain proof of one part of the σκληρός λόγοs, with which indeed the rest of it was bound up,-His having descended from heaven. All attempts (as those of Lücke, De Wette, and others) to explain this otherwise than of His ascent into heaven, are simply dishonest,-and spring from laxity of belief in the historical reality of that event. That it is not recorded by John, is of no moment here: see Prolegomena. And that none but the Twelve saw it, is unimportant; for how do we know that our Lord was not here speaking to some among the Twelve? To explain it of His death, as part of His going up where He was before, is hardly less disingenuous. Lücke maintains that θεωρείν need not mean bodily sight: which is true enough in some constructions in John (ch. viii. 51 al.); but surely, as joined with αναβαίνοντα, it must. The whole exegesis of the passage in the above-named Commentators is a remarkable instance of the warping of the judgment by unsoundness of belief in the historical truth of the evangelistic testimony. 63.] πνεῦμα, σάρξ, do not mean the spiritual and carnal sense of the foregoing discourse, as many Commentators explain them: for our Lord is speaking, not of teaching merely, but of vivifying: He is explaining the life-giving principle of which He had been before speaking. Such eating of My flesh as you imagine and find hard to listen to, could profit you nothing,-for it will have ascended up, &c.; and besides, generally, it is only the Spirit that can vivify the spirit of man: the flesh (in whatever way

The common interpretation is, 'the words which I have spoken, 'i. e. 'My discourses,' are πνεῦμα, 'to be taken in a spiritual sense,' (? this sense of πνεῦμα,) 'and are life.' In the following words the readings vary; the common text having been to all appearance introduced from Matt. xvi. 16. The circumstance of the Lord not being elsewhere called δ αγιος τ. θεοῦ by John, is of course in favour of the reading. The idea however is found (ch. x. 36). I regard the coincidence with the testimony of the dæmoniacs, reff. Mark ||, as a remark-Their words appear to have able one. been the first plain declaration of the fact, and so to have laid hold on the attention of the Apostles. 70. The selection of the Twelve by Jesus is the consequence of the giving of them to Him by the Father, ch. xvii. 6,-in which there also

Judas is included. So that His selecting, and the Father's giving and drawing, do not exclude final falling away. Meyer observes, that the solemn addition, τους δώδεκα after ὑμᾶς, heightens the contrast to the opposite result which follows.

διάβολος It is doubtful in what sense this word should be taken. Whether we render it διαβολικός (= τοῦ διαβόλου ύπουργός), or ἐπίβουλος, (both given by Euthym.,) it will be an ἄπαξ λεγόμενον in the N. T. Of the two however the latter is the harsher, and less analogous to N. T. diction. Certainly, in the dark act here prophesied, Judas was under the immediate instigation of and yielded himself up to Satan (cf. our Lord's reply to Peter, Matt. xvi. 23); and I would understand this expression as having reference to that league with and entertainment of the Evil One in his thoughts and purposes, which his ultimate possession by Satan implies. This meaning can perhaps hardly be rendered by any single word in another language. The E. V. 'a devil' is certainly too strong; devilish would be better, but not unobjectionable. Compare δ υίδς της ἀπωλείας ch. xvii. 12.

71.] On the name Ἰσκαριώτης (here applied to Simon, Judas's father), see on έμελλεν, not, 'intended,' see ch. xiii. 2: but simply future, $= \hat{\eta} \nu \delta$ παραδώσων αὐτόν, see ver. 64; ch. vii.

CHAP. VII.—X.] JESUS THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD. The conflict at its height. VII. 1-52.] JESUS MEETS THE

UNBELIEF OF THE JEWS AT JERUSALEM. The circumstances (vv. 1-13). The chronology of this period is very doubtful. I have remarked on it in my note on Luke ix. 51. Thus much we may observe here, that μετά ταῦτα cannot apply emphatically to ch. vi., but must be referred back to ch. v., as indeed must the Jews seeking to kill Him, and the miracle alluded to in ver. 23. But it will not follow from this, that ch. vi. is not in its right place: it contains an independent memoir of a miracle and discourse of our Lord in Galilee which actually happened in the interval, and only serves to shew us the character of this Gospel as made up of such memoirs, more or less connected with one another, and selected by the Evangelist for their higher spiritual import, and the discourses arising from them. I would understand this verse as merely carrying on the time from ch. v. and ch. vi., -and its contents as introductory to the account of Jesus not going up at first to the feast. Ch. vi. is in some measure presupposed in our ver. 3, as indicating that He had not constantly observed the festal journeys of late.

2. See Deut. xvi. 13-17. Josephus, Antt. viii. 4. 1, calls this έορτη άγιωτάτη καί μεγίστη. It began on the 15th (evening of 14th) of Tisri [Sept. 28], and lasted till the evening of the 22nd [Oct. 6]. 3-5.] Respecting the BRETHREN OF THE LORD, see note on Matt. xiii. 55. They seem to have had at this time a kind of belief in the Messianic character of Jesus, but of the very lowest sort, not excluding the harsh and scoffing spirit visible in these words. They recognized his miracles, but despised his apparent want of prudence and consistency of purpose, in not shewing himself to the world. In the iva kai of $\mu\alpha\theta$. $\sigma\sigma\nu$ $\kappa.\tau.\lambda$. there is perhaps a reference to the desertion of many of his disciples just before. Nay, more than this: the indication furnished by this verse of the practice of our Lord with regard to His miracles up to this point is very curious. He appears as yet to have made His circuits in Galilee, and to have wrought miracles there, in the presence of but a small circle of disciples properly so called: and there would seem to have been a larger number of disciples, in the wider sense, in Judæa, or to be gathered in Judæa by the feast, who yet wanted assuring, by open display, of the reality of His won-derful works. In ver. 5 (as well as by οἱ μαθηταί σου, ver. 3), we have these brethren absolutely excluded from the number of the Twelve (see ch. vi. 69); and it is impossible to modify the meaning αὐτοῦ "ἐπίστευον εἰς αὐτόν. ⁶ λέγει οὖν αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς w ch. ii. 11 reft.

of επίπτευον so as to suppose that they may have been of the Twelve, but not believers in the highest sense. This verse also excludes all of His brethren: it is inconceivable that John should have so written, if any among them believed at that time. The attempt to make the words mean, that some of his brethren did not believe on him, is in my view quite futile. In that case we should certainly have had some such expression as ήσαν γάρ καὶ ἐκ τῶν ἀδελφῶν αὐτοῦ, οἱ ούκ ἐπίστευον είς αὐτόν. No such attempt would ever have been made by a Greek scholar,-except for the fiction which has been so long, and, strange to say, is still upheld with regard to our Lord's brethren.

The emphatic expression, obse yap of as, is a strong corroboration of the view that they were really and literally brethren: see also Ps. Ixix. 8.

6-9.] δ καιρ. δ έμ. can hardly be taken as directly meaning the time of my sufferings and death, but as ή ἄρα μου in ch. ii. 4: 'My time for the matter of which you speak, viz. manifestation to the world.' That (ch. xii. 32) was to take place in a very different manner. But they, having no definite end before them, no glory of God to shew forth, but being of the world, always had their opportunity ready of mingling with and standing well with the world. Then (ver. 7), 'you have no hatred of the world in your way: but its hatred to Me on account of my testimony against it, causes me to exercise this caution which you so blame.' 8, it is of little import (see var. readd.) whether we read οὐκ or οὖπω: the sense will be the same, both on account of the present, ἀναβαίνω (not ἀναβήσομαι, which would express the disavowal of an intention to go up), and of ούπω afterwards. ούκ avaß. would mean, I am not (at present) going up. Meyer attributes to our Lord change of purpose, and justifies his view by the example of His treatment of the Syrophœnician woman, whom He at first repulsed, but afterwards had compassion Matt. xv. 26 ff. The same Commentator directs attention to the emphatic ταύτην, as implying that our Lord had it

Whether the Twelve were with Him, we have no means of judging: probably so, for they appear ch. ix. 2; and after their becoming once attached to the Person of our Lord as Apostles, we find no trace of his having been for any long time separated from them, except during their mission Matt. x., which was long ago accomplished.

11.] These 'louδ. are, as usual, the ἄρχονres, as distinguished from the multitudes. Their question itself (¿κεῖνος) shews a hostile spirit. 12.] οἱ ὅχλ. (the different groups of which ὁ ὅχλος was composed) would include the Galilæan disciples, and those who had been baptized by the disciples in Judæa,—whose view άγαθός ἐστίν would represent,—as expressed mildly in protest against His πλανα τὸν ὅχλον, possibly enemies. in reference to the feeding of and then the discourse to the multitude, which had given so much offence. 13. παρβ.] This was true only of the side who said αγαθός ἐστιν: they dared not speak their mind: the others spoke plainly enough. His teaching is from the Father. 14, 15. τ. έορ. μεσ., about the middle of the feast. Probably on a sabbath (see Wieseler, Chron. i. 309). It appears to have been the first time that He ἐδίδασκεν publicly at Jerusalem; -whence (our) the wonder of the Jews, i.e. the rulers of γράμματα—generally the hierarchy. letters; but also particularly, scripturelearning-perhaps because this was all the literature of the Jews: see reff. Probably His teaching consisted in exposition of the Scripture. μη μεμ., never having been the scholar of any Rabbi. He was θεοδίδακτος. These words are spoken in the true bigotry and prejudice of so-called 'learning.' These words of His enemies, testifying to matter of fact well known to them, are, as Meyer observes, decisive against all attempts of unbelievers to attribute our Lord's knowledge to education in any human school of learning. Such indications are not without their value in these times. 16.] Here only does our Lord call His teaching διδαχή, as being now among the διδάστὸ ρ θέλημα αὐτοῦ ορ ποιεῖν, γνώσεται περὶ τῆς η διδαχῆς, ρ Matt. vil. 21 reff. ο πότερον τ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστιν, ἡ ἐγὰ κατ ἐμαυτοῦ λαλῶ. ο Αρονίι τος 18 ὁ καθ ἀκον τὴν δόξαν τὴν ἰδίαν ζητεῖ ὁ δὲ ρ Ματτ. 18 ὁ και ἀδικία ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστιν. 19 οὐ Μωυσῆς τ ἔδωκεν ὑμῖν τὸν νόμον; καὶ οὐδεὶς ἐξ ὑμῶν η ποιεῖ τὸν τ απί. 13 εδι. ν. 10 reff. νόμον τί με ζητεῖτε ἀποκτεῖναι; 20 ἀπεκρίθη ὁ ὅχλος 4 και 4 διαι καὶ 4 διαι καὶ 2 διαιμόνιον 4 ἔχεις τίς σε 4 ζητεῖ ἀποκτεῖναι; 21 ἀπεκρίθη 4 καὶ 4 καὶ 4 διδι. 18 η Γιαις νίμιν τὸν νόμον τός 4 εδι. 4 δικι 4 δικι 4 δικι 4 δις 4 δις δις 4 δις $^{$

The words may bear two meanings: -either, 'the sense of Scripture which I teach is not my own, but that in which it was originally penned as a revelation from God; or, My teaching (generally) is not mine, but that of Him who sent me. The latter is preferable, as agreeing better with what follows, and because the former assumes that He was expounding Scripture, which, though probable, is not asserted. 17.] θέλειν τὸ θέλ. αὐτ. ποιείν is equivalent to την άγάπην τοῦ θεοῦ ἔχειν ἐν ἑαυτοῖs, ch. v. 42. The θέλειν should not have been slurred over in the E. V., for it is important. If any man's will be, to do His will, &c. As it now stands in the E. V., a wrong idea is conveyed: that the bare performance of God's outward commands will give a man sufficient acquaintance with Christian doctrine:-whereas what our Lord asserts to the Jews is, that if the will be set in His ways, if a man be really anxious to do the will of God, and thus to fulfil this first great commandment of the law, -be, as Meyer expresses it, in ethical harmony with God,-the singleness of purpose, and subjection to the will of God, will lead him on to faith in the promised and then apparent Messiah, and to a just discrimination of the divine character of his teaching.

18.] This gives us the reason why he, who wishes to do God's will, will know of the teaching of Christ: viz. because both are seeking one aim—the glory of God:—and the humility of him, whose will it is to do God's will, can best appreciate that more perfect humility of the divine Son, who speaks not of himself, but of Him that sent him,—see ch. v. 41-44, of which this verse is a repetition with a somewhat different bearing. In its general sense, it asserts that self exaltation and self-seeking necessarily accompany the unaided teaching of man, but that all true teaching is from God. But then we must remember that, simply taken, the latter part of the sentence is only true of the Holy One Himself; that owing to human infirmity, purity of motive is no sure guarantee for correctness of doctrine;—and therefore in this second part it is not $\tau o \hat{v} \theta \epsilon o \hat{v}$, which would generalize it to all men, but $\tau o \hat{v} \pi \epsilon \mu \nu$. $a \hat{v} \tau \delta v$, which confines it to Himself. 19.1 There is a close connexion with the

19.7 There is a close connexion with the foregoing. Our Lord now takes the offensive against them. The θέλειν τὸ θέλημα αὐτοῦ ποιείν was to be the great key to a true appreciation of His teaching: but of this there was no example among them: and therefore it was that they were no fair judges of the teaching, but bitter opponents and persecutors of Jesus, of whom, had they been anxious to fulfil the law, they would have been earnest and humble disciples (ch. v. 46). The law was to be read before all Israel every seventh year in the feast of tabernacles (Deut. xxxi. 10-13) :- whether this was such a year is uncertain: but this verse may allude to the practice, even if it was not. άποκτ. 21.] The one work was the sabbathhealing in ch. v. 22. διὰ τοῦτο is variously placed; either at the end of ver. 21, so as to come after θαυμάζετε, (Cod. X, lat. 9, Theophyl, Beza, and many of the moderns, Lücke, De Wette, Stier, Lachmann, &c.,)—or at the beginning of this verse (Codd. D, E, G, K, L, T, U, A, A, [H, S, T, II,] vulg., the syriac versions, coptt., goth., Euthym., Chrys., Cyril, Grotius, &c.). I prefer the latter arrangement: because (1) I believe $\tau o \hat{v} \tau o$ would not be used in the sense required by the other, but αὐτό (nor can I see that the ev epyov makes the τοῦτο any more applicable (see Stier, edn. 2, iv. 315); nay, it seems to me to take the attention off from the particular work done, and fix it on the mere εν έργ. ποιησαι, abstractedly—' Ye wonder that I have acted at all'): and (2) because I find διά τοῦτο joined with ὅτι to be a usual mode of speaking with our Evangelist, see ch. v. 16, 18; viii. 47 (θαυμάζειν διά τι is used Mark vi. 6: Rev. xvii. 7: see also John iii. 29). (3) I see an appropriateness of meaning in ver. 22 with the διὰ τοῦτο, which it has not without it. Moses on this account gave you circumcision, not because it is of Moses, but of the fathers; (the repetition of ἐκ τ. Μωυ. ἐστ. does not necessarily imply a parenthesis: John constantly uses these formal repetitions: this in answer to Stier, iv. 315, edn. 2)-i. e. it is no part of the law of Moses, properly so called,—but was adopted by Moses, and thereby becomes part of his law. The meaning of oùx ori, 'not that,' implying 'I mean not, that,' does not seem to suit the context so well, because it would leave the preceding διὰ τοῦτο without any thing to refer to. Now you circumcise on the Sabbath, to avoid breaking the law of Moses, &c. If our Lord had said these last words (in ver. 23) merely, the argument would not have been strict: they might have answered, that circumcision was not only a command of the law, but anterior to it: whereas ver. 22 takes this answer from them; reminding them that though they regarded its sanction as derived from Moses, it was in fact older,and tacitly approving their doing it on the Sabbath. Then the argument is, If this may be done on the Sabbath :- if an ordinance strictly Mosaic (which the Sabbath in its Jewish mode of observance was) may be set aside by another, Mosaic also, but more ancient, and borrowed from a more general and direct command of God ("circumcisio est antiquior rigido otio sabbati per Mosen imperato"-Grotius), how much more may it by a deed of mercy, a benevolent exercise of divine power, the approval of which is anterior to and deeper than all ceremonial enactment?

VII.

23.] ἴνα μὴ λυθ $\hat{\eta}$ -not,-" ita ut non solvatur"-" salva lege;" which is ungrammatical; -- but in order that the Law of Moses may not be broken, viz. that which (after the fathers) ordains circumcision on the eighth day. aνθρ. The distinction is between circumcision, which purified only part of a man, by which he received $(\xi \lambda \alpha \beta \epsilon \nu)$ ceremonial cleanness,-and that perfect and entire healing which the Lord bestowed on the cripple. Stier (after Bengel) thinks the ὅλον refers to body and soul,—see ch. v. 14,—whose healing is a much greater benefit than circumcision, even viewed as a sacrament: "nam circumcisio est medium, sanatio anima finis." But this is perhaps too subtle. The Jews could not have appreciated this meaning, and the argument is especially addressed to them. Besides, it is by no means certain from that passage that such was the case.

25-31.] HE HIMSELF IS FROM THE FATHER. 25, 26.] The inhabitants of Jerusalem know better than the ὅχλος the mind of their rulers towards Jesus; and suspect some change in their purpose, on account of His being thus permitted to teach freely. 27.] Perhaps they refer to the idea (see Justin Mart., Dial. c. Tryph. 8, 110, pp. 110, 203) that the Messiah would not be known (ἄγνωστός ἐστι καλ οὐδὲ αὐτός πω ξαυτόν ἐπίσταται) until anointed by Elias, when He would suddenly come forth from obscurity.

They may allude to Isa, liii. 8. place of the Messiah's birth was known, At all events we see here, that the Jews regarded their Messiah not as a mere man, but one to be supernaturally sent into the world. 28, 29. εκραξεν,-in the same open undisguised manner referred to in παρδησία λαλεί above; but διδάσκων, in the course of His teaching. κάμὲ οἴδατε] It has been questioned whether these words are to be taken ironically, interrogatively, or affirmatively. I incline to the last view, for this reason :- obviously no very high degree of knowledge whence He was is implied, for they knew not Him that sent Him (see also ch. viii. 14, 19), and therefore could not know whence He was, in this sense. The answer is made in their own sense :- they knew that He was from Nazareth in Galilee, see ver. 41,-and probably that He was called the son of Joseph. In this sense they knew whence He was; but further than this they knew not. καὶ ἀπ' ἐμ. and moreover—and besides this—not = but. The sense of άληθινός must be gathered from the context. I have not come of Myself, but He who sent Me is αληθινός—ye know Him not; I know Him,-for I came from Him, and He sent Me. The matter here impressed on them is the genuineness, the reality of the fact :- that Jesus was sent, and there was one who sent Him, though they knew Him not, and consequently knew not $\pi \delta \theta \epsilon \nu \epsilon \sigma \tau \ell \nu$. really existent, not 'truthful,' which it may be questioned whether the word άληθινός will bear, although it is so maintained by Euthym., Cyril, Chrys., Theophylact, Lampe, Baumgarten-Crusius, Tholuck, and many others. See on this, ch. viii. 16 and note. With the & of the rec. omitted the sense becomes more emphatic. It was probably inserted on account of the apparent want of connexion, as has been the case very frequently throughout the Gospel. We have here an instance of a usage of ekelvos which is very common in St. John, as emphasizing the main subject, not (as more commonly) diverting the attention to one more removed. In ignorance of this usage, Hilgenfeld, "Die Evangelia nach ihrer Entstehung, u. s. w.," has argued from ch. xix. 35, that the writer of this Gospel cannot himself have been an eye-witness of the crucifixion, because he there distinguishes that witness by ¿κείνος from himself. In consequence of this assertion, an article appeared in the Stud. u. Kritik. for 1859, pt. 3, by G. E. Steiss, in which the use of ekeivos by St. John is gone into, and Hilgenfeld's mistake (which Köstlin had committed before him) was exposed. Referring to that article for the full treatment of the subject, I merely cite from among many other instances of the usage, ch. i. 18, 33; v. 11; vi. 57; x. 1; xii. 48; xiv. 12, 21, 26; xvii. 24.

30.] Namely, the rulers,—instigated by what had been above remarked by the people, vv. 25, 26. There was some secondary hindrance to their laying hands on Him,—possibly the fear of the people: but the Evangelist passes at once to the real cause;—that God's appointed time was not yet come.

31.] The δέ here contrasts with what went before—nay, many &c. The indefiniteness of ὅταν ἔλθη implies their belief that the Christ had come.

The words were spoken, not to the officers only, but to all the people. ἔτι χρ. μικ.] This appears to be said in reference to ver. 30, to shew them the uselessness of their attempting to lay hands on Him till His hour was come, which it soon would πρὸς τ. πέμψ. με] It has been asked, 'If Jesus thus specified where He was going, how could the Jews ask the question in ver. 35?' but De Wette answers well, that the Jews knew not The πέμψαντα αὐτόν, and therefore the saying was a dark one to them. ζητ. με, κ. ούχ εύρ. These words must not be pressed too much, as has been done by many interpreters (Chrysost., Theophyl., Euthym., Meyer, Tholuck, but not in his 6th edn.), who would make them mean, 'Ye shall seek My help and not find it' (viz. in your need, at the destruction of Jerusalem); for this would not be true even of the Jews, any one of whom might have at any time turned and looked on Him whom he had pierced, by faith,-and have been saved;—nor again must it be taken as meaning, 'Ye shall seek to lay hands on Me, and shall not be able' (Orig., Grot.), —which is vapid and unmeaning. Neither of these interpretations, nor their cognates, will agree with the parallel place, ch. xiii. 33, where the same words are used to the disciples. The meaning is simply (as in reff.), 'My bodily presence will be with-drawn from you; I shall be personally in a place inaccessible to you: 'see ch. xiii. 36.

εἰμί, am; not εἶμι, 'go,' which is never used in the N. T. Nor need we supply $\tau \delta \tau \epsilon$; the present tense is used in the solemn sense of ch. i. 18, and ch. iii. 13, to signify essential truth. Compare οὐ δύνασθε addressed to the Jews, with οὐ δύνασαί μοι νῦν ἀκολ., ἀκολουθήσεις δὲ ὕστερον to Peter, ch. xiii. 36, and it will be evident that the Lord had their spiritual state in view: 'Ye cannot, as ye are now, enter there.' On the whole, see Luke xvii. 22. 35, 36.] The Jews understood not his death to be meant, but some journey which he would take in the event of their rejecting him.

The διασπ. τ. Έλλ. must not be interpreted 'the Hellenistic Jews,' for the Ελληνες are always distinguished from the Jews; and this would convey hardly any meaning. The sense of διασπορά is,-see reff. James, 1 Pet.,- 'the country where Jews lay scattered,' as qualified by the succeeding genitive, where one occurs, as here. So here ἡ δ. τ. Έλ. means 'the dispersed in the Gentile world;'—and their intent is, to convey contempt and mockery. They do not however believe the hypothesis; but ask again, τίς ἐστιν ό λόγος ούτος;

kept seven days, and on the eighth is a solemn assembly, "according unto the manner," In Num. xxix. 12-38, where minute directions are given for every day of the feast, the eighth day is reckoned in, as usual. Josephus, Antt. iii. 10. 4, gives a similar account. In 2 Macc. x. 6, we read ἡμέρας ὀκτώ, σκηνωμάτων τρόπον. But the eighth day was not properly one of the feast days; the people ceased to dwell in the tabernacles on the seventh day. Philo says of it, έπτὰ δὲ ἡμέραις ὀγδόην έπισφραγίζεται, καλέσας εξόδιον αὐτήν, οὺκ εκείνης ως ἔοικε μόνον τῆς ἑορτῆς, άλλὰ πασῶν τῶν ἐτησίων ὅσας καθ. ημιθμήσαμεν τελευταία γὰρ ἐστι τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ. De Septenario, § 24. And though this, as Lücke observes (ii. 224), may be pure conjecture, it is valuable, as shewing the fact the reason of which is conjectured; viz. that the eighth day was held in more than ordinary estimation. The eighth day then seems here to be meant, and the last of the feast to be popularly used, as in some of the citations above. But a difficulty attends this view. Our Lord certainly seems to allude here to the custom which prevailed during the seven days of the feast, of a priest bringing water in a golden vessel from the pool of Siloam with a jubilant procession to the temple, standing on the altar and pouring it out there, together with wine, while meantime the Hallel (Ps. cxiii.exviii.) was sung. This practice was by some supposed-as the dwelling in tabernacles represented their life in the desert of old-to refer to the striking of the rock by Moses:-by others, to the rain, for which they then prayed, for the seed of the ensuing year:—by the elder Rabbis (Maimonides, cited by Stier, iv. 331, edn. 2), to Isa. xii. 3, and the effusion of the Holy Spirit in the days of the Messiah. But it was universally agreed (with the single exception of the testimony of R. Juda Hakkadosh, quoted in the tract Succa, which itself distinctly asserts the contrary), that on the eighth day this ceremony did not take place. Now, out of this difficulty I would extract what I believe to be the right interpretation. It was the eighth day, and the pouring of water did not take place. But is therefore (as Lücke will have it) all allusion to the ceremony excluded?

I think not: nay, I believe it is the more natural. For seven days the ceremony had been performed, and the Hallel sung. On the eighth day the Hallel was sung, but the outpouring of the water did not take place: "desideraverunt aliquid." 'Then Jesus stood and cried, &c.' Was not this the most natural time? Was it not probable that He would have said it at such a time, rather even than while the ceremony itself was going on? attempt has been made to alter the punctuation thus: ἐάν τις διψᾶ, ἐρχέσθω πρός με, καὶ πινέτω ὁ πιστεύων εἰς ἐμέ· καθώς εἶπεν ή γρ., ποταμοί κ.τ.λ. Of this I can only say, that it is surprising to me how any one accustomed to the style of our Evangelist can for a moment suppose it possible. The harshness of καl πινέτω δ π . els è μ is beyond all example. The ordinary punctuation, making δ πισ. είς εμέ a nom. abs., see ch. vi. 39, is the only admissible one,-even were it beset with far greater difficulties than it is. (The punctuation above mentioned is strongly upheld against this note in Stier, edn. 2. In spite of what he there says, I cannot think it can ever make way among Biblical scholars. It introduces two subjects into the first part of the sentence, viz. δ διψών and δ πιστεύων είς εμέ, to the utter confusion of both sense and metaphor. The distinction, insisted on by Stier, between the believer on Christ, who was not only to come, but to drink, - and the people at the feast, who only witnessed the outpouring of the water, - and which he gives as a reason why πινέτω must stand emphatically before δ πιστ. its qualifying subject, will be quite as marked with the usual punctuation: nay even more so.) the first clauses, see notes on ch. iv. 13, 14. $\kappa a\theta \omega s \epsilon i\pi$. $\hat{\eta} \gamma \rho$.] These words must apply to $\pi \sigma \tau a \mu o l$ $\hat{\epsilon} \tau$. κ ..., since $\delta \pi \iota \sigma \tau$. $\hat{\epsilon} i\hat{s} \hat{\epsilon} \mu \hat{\epsilon}$ could not form part of the citation. But we look in vain for such a text in the O. T., and an apocryphal or lost canonical book is out of the question.

I believe the citation to be intimately connected with the ceremony referred to, and that we must look for its place by consulting the passages where the flowing out of water from the temple (see above) is spoken of. The most remarkable of these is found in Ezek. xlvii. 1-12.

There a morauds of water of life (see ver. 9 especially) flows from under the threshold of the temple. Again in Zech. xiv. 8, $\xi\xi\epsilon\lambda\epsilon \psi\sigma\epsilon\tau ai$ $\delta\delta\omega\rho$ $\delta\omega$ $\delta\xi$ (1 $\epsilon\rho\sigma\lambda\lambda\mu$. I believe these expressions to be all to which the citation applies, and the ἐκ τῆς κοι-λίας αὐτοῦ to be the interpretation of the corresponding words in the prophecies. For the temple was symbolic (see ch. ii. 21) of the Body of the Lord; and the Spirit which dwells in and flows forth from His glorified Body, dwells in and flows forth from His people also, who are made like unto Him, Gal. iv. 6: Rom. viii. 9-11: 1 Cor. iii. 16. 39.] The diffi-culties raised concerning this interpretation of the saying of our Lord have arisen from a misapprehension. John does not say that the words were a prophecy of what happened on the day of Pentecost; but of the Spirit, which the believers were about to receive. Their first reception of Him must not be illogically put in the place of all His indwelling and working, which are here intended. And the symbolism of the N. T. is fully satisfied by the interpretation. Granted that the water is the water of life-what is that life but the life of the Spirit? το φρόνημα τοῦ πνεύμ., ζωή, Rom. viii. 6; and again, τὸ πνεθμα, ζωή, ib. ver. 10. It is lamentable to see such able and generally rightminded Commentators as Lücke carping at the interpretation of an Apostle, and the one Apostle who perhaps of all men living had the deepest insight into the wonderful analogies of spiritual things.

ούπω ήν] The additions δεδομένον, δοθέν, ἐπ' αὐτοῖς, are all glosses, to avoid a misunderstanding which no intelligent reader could fall into. Chr. in loc. quotes the verse thus: ὁ εὐαγγελιστής ἔλεγεν, Ούπω γὰρ ἦν πνεῦμα ἄγιον, τουτέστι δο-θέν, ἐπεὶ Ἰησοῦς οὕπω ἐδοξάσθη δόξαν καλών του σταυρόν. It is obvious that ην cannot refer to the essential existence of the Holy Spirit, as this would be not only in flat contradiction to ch. i. 32, 33; iii. 5, 8, 34, but to the whole O. T., in which the agency of the Spirit in the outward world is recognized even more vividly than in the N. T. The $\hat{\eta}\nu$ implies not exactly δεδομένον, but rather ένεργοῦν, or some similar word: was not,-had not come in; 'the dispensation of the Spirit was not yet.' έδοξάσθη, through death. The glorified Body of the Lord is the temple from under whose threshold the Holy Spirit flows forth to us: see ch. i. 16: Rom. viii. 11: Col. ii. 9. 40.7 ό προφήτης is here clearly distinguished from ὁ χριστός: see note on ch. i. 21, and 41-43. The men-Deut. xviii. 15. tion of the question about Bethlehem seems to me rather to corroborate our belief that the Evangelist was well aware how the fact stood, than (De Wette) to imply that he was ignorant of it. marks are appended, is natural. John had one great design in writing his Gospel, and does not allow it to be interfered with by explanations of matters otherwise known. Besides, we may note that De Wette's "probability, that John knew nothing of the birth at Bethlehem," reaches much further than may appear at first. If John knew nothing of it, and yet the mother of the Lord lived with him, the inference must be that she knew nothing of it,-in other words, that it never happened.

Either these officers had been watching Jesus for some days, or the present section goes back a little from what has preceded. The latter is more probable.

49.7 There is no intention to pronounce a formal ban upon the followers of Jesus ;-the words are merely a passionate expression of contempt. The putting a stop at νόμον, and supplying ἐπίστευσεν εἰς αὐτόν, and then making ἐπάρ. εἰσιν! an exclamation (Paulus, Kuinoel), is not to be thought of. 50.] The Jews had, since the sabbath-healing, condemned Jesus, and were seeking to kill him. But in Exod. xxiii. 1, 2: Deut. i. 16, 17, justice is commanded to be done in the way here insisted on by Nicodemus. On the consistency, and development, of the character of Nicodemus, Luthardt has some valuable remarks, pp. 125 ff. [see on ch. xix. 39].

53—Chap. VIII 11. The history of THE WOMAN TAKEN IN ADULTERY .- See var. readd.; and a very complete discussion of the authorities for and against the passage in Lücke (edn. 3), ii. 243—256. The critical examination of the genuineness of this passage is attended with many and complicated difficulties. Setting aside here purely diplomatic evidence (for which see var. readd.), we may observe (1) that at first sight, the reasons given by Aug. and Nicon seem enough to warrant the inference that it was expunged on account of the supposed licence given by it to sin. And this has been the hypothesis generally adopted by those who would override critical difficulties by strong autoeratic as-sertion. Even Stier and Ebrard decide thus, without pausing to examine the real complications of the question. But (2) granting that such an hypothesis might be admissible as regards ch. viii. 3-11, I do not see how the whole passage can be involved in it, especially the opening verse 53, which would naturally appear to form a sequel to what has preceded, and would surely never have been expunged with the offensive paragraph. (3) No such hypothesis as this will account for the coexistence of so many distinct and independent texts, apparently none of which owes its origin to any attempt to remove matter of offence. This phænomenon (not that of the abundance of various readings, from which it is totally distinct) points undoubtedly to some inherent defect in the text of the passage itself, irrespective of all treatment subsequent to its establishment as a part of the sacred narrative. (4) At the same time it is an embarrassing circumstance, that the contents of the passage are of such a kind, as to give every countenance to the supposition above dealt with. Had they been otherwise, we should have been much more free in pronouncing a critical decision for or against it. (5) Another difficulty is presented by the very general concurrence of the MSS. containing the passage, in placing it here. If it was not originally found in the text, why should this place, of all others, have been selected for its insertion? It has no connexion with the context: belongs, apparently, to another portion of our Lord's ministry: what could induce the interpolators to place it here? (6) Nor are we helped much by its variations of position in some MSS. The end of Luke xxi. seems most to approve itself as the fitting place. but if it was the original one, it is totally inexplicable that we should find no trace of the fact there, except in four of the (best) cursive mss. Its occurrence here then, seems to me much in its favour. (7) After all, the most weighty argument against the passage is found in its entire 'Εγώ εἰμι τὸ a φῶς τοῦ a κόσμου ὁ ἀκολουθῶν ἐμοὶ a = ch. ix. 5.

diversity from the style of narrative of our Evangelist. It is not merely that many words and idioms occur which John never uses, but that the whole cast and character of the passage is alien from his manner, in whichever of the existing texts we read it. (It would be hardly worth while to cite an opinion which affirms that "such a course of argument is very fallacious, leads to nothing but endless logomachies, and can never settle a question of this kind" (Bloomf. edn. 9), -were it not carnestly to remind my readers, that the more the sacred text is really studied, the more such considerations, duly and cautiously weighed, will be urged and appreciated.) (8) Balancing all these difficulties, I am almost disposed, as a desperate resource, to adopt the following hypothesis; not as by any means satisfying or even recommending itself to me, but as really the only one which seems at all to shew us a way out of the ænigma: That the Evangelist may have, in this solitary case, incorporated a portion of the current oral tradition into his narrative: that this portion may have been afterwards variously corrected, from the Gospel of the Hebrews, or other traditional sources: that being seen in early times to be alien from John's diction, it may have been by some replaced in the synoptic narrative, in its apparent chronological place, at Luke xxi. fin. : or inserted variously in this Gospel from the mere fact of having dropped out here. Then again the contents of the passage would operate with the above causes to its exclusion altogether from many MSS .: and the fact of some excluding only ch. viii. 3-11, seems certainly to shew that the moral element did operate in the matter. (9) Dropping all idea of the hypothesis just suggested, our conclusion on the data must I think be, to retain the passage, as we retain Mark xvi. 9 ff., with a distinction from the rest of the text. With regard to the question, what text of the passage itself to adopt, it would seem idle to attempt to unite into one by critical processes texts which seem to be due to different sources. Our solution of the question must be merely formal and diplomatic. And, thus solving it, it has been thought best in this Edition to give the text as it is found in the only one of our most ancient Mss. which contains it: the amount and nature of the variations being fully seen in the accompanying Digest. In adopting this plan, it will be observed that no judgment whatever is given on the purity of the text thus adopted, -no approval whatever of the Codex Bezæ as a fons lectionum: our proceeding is simply a formal and objective one, adopted as a necessity where no other seemed even mode-53. The circumrately satisfactory. stance that this verse is included in the dubious passage is remarkable, and seems to shew, as remarked above, that the doubt has not arisen from the ethical difficulty, as Aug. hints (var. readd.), -for then the passage would have begun with ch. viii. 1. Nor can this verse have been expunged to keep up the connexion with ch. viii. 12for that is just as good with it,-if understood, as usually, of the members of the Sanhedrim. We must now regard it as fragmentary, forming the beginning of the account of the woman taken in adultery. It is therefore not clear to what the words apply. Taken in conjunction with what follows (see on ch. viii. 5), I should say that they indicate some time during the last days of the Lord's ministry, when He spent the nights on the Mount of Olives, as the date of the occurrence. Certainly the end of Luke xxi. seems to be its fitter CHAP. VIII. 1.] John never place. elsewhere mentions the Mount of Olives (not even in ch. xviii. 1): and when he

are forced and harsh. It was, say they, the early morning (ver. 2) and the sun was just rising, to which these words τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσ. allude,—and the walking in darkness is an allusion to the woman, whose deed of darkness had been detected in the night. But not to dwell on other objections to this view,-e.g. that such an allusion to the woman would be wholly out of character after our Lord's previous treatment of her,-how come these Pharisees, who on the hypothesis of the above Commentators are the same as those who accused the woman, to be again so soon present? Was this at all likely? We cannot escape from this difficulty with Stier, iv. 363, edn. 2, by supposing a multitude of the people to have been witnesses on both occasions: the of Papisaloi of the one must surely extend through the other, if this connexion is to be maintained. On the other hand, this discourse comes in very well after ch. vii. 52. The last saying of Jesus (ch. vii. 37, 38) had referred to a festal usage then just over: He now adds another of the same kind. It was the custom during the first night, if not during every night, of the feast of tabernacles (see authorities in Wetstein), to light up two large golden chandeliers in the court of the women, the light of which illuminated all Jerusalem. All that night they held a festal dance by the light.

Now granted that this was on the first night only,-what is there improbable in the supposition that our Lord-standing in the very place where the candlesticks had been or perhaps actually were should have alluded to that practice, as He did to the outpouring of water in ch. vii. 37, 38? Surely to say in both cases, as Lücke and De Wette do, that the allusion could not have been made unless the usage took place on that day, is mere trifling. While the feast lasted, and the remembrance of the ceremonies was fresh, the allusion would be perfectly natural.

chapter. Nor does he ever mention oi γραμματείς elsewhere, but usually calls the opponents of Jesus οί Ἰουδαίοι, or οί ἄρχοντες. οἱ γρ. κ. οἱ Φ. is a very common expression in the synoptic narrative.

The account gives no light as to the capacity in which these Scribes and Pharisees acted when they brought the woman. Probably, only as tempting Jesus, and not in the course of any legal proceedings against her. Such would have required (Levit. xx. 10: Deut. xxii. 22) that the man also should have been put to death.

4.] Της λέγουσιν αὐτῷ ἐκπειράζοντες αὐτόν savours much more of the synoptic Gospels than of John: see Matt. xvi. 1; xix. 3; xxii. 18, 35: Mark viii. 11; x. 2; xii. 15, &c. Obviously our ch. vi. 6 is no example to the contrary. (So Luthardt.) The difficulty is even greater than the last, to say, in what sense this was a temptation, to lead to His accusation. The principal solutions of it have been, (1) that the command of the law had fallen into disuse from the frequency of the crime, and to re-assert it would be contrary to the known mildness of Jesus (Michaelis (first part), Aug., Euthym.). But what reason had any of His sayings,-who came to fulfil the Law, not to destroy it,given them to expect such mildness in this case? And suppose He had re-asserted the law,-how could they have accused Him? (2) That some political snare was hereby laid for Him, whereby the Roman power might have been brought to bear against Him (Grotius and others). But this does not in any way appear; for (a) the Romans certainly allowed to the Jews (by connivance) the power of putting to death according to their law,—as they did in the case of Stephen: (3) our Lord's answer need not have been so worded as to trench upon this matter: and (γ) the accusers would have been more deeply involved than Himself, if such had been the case, being by the law the prominent persons in the execution. So that I leave the difficulty unsolved. Lücke (whose discussion on it see, ii. 261 ff.) observes: "Since Jesus seems to avoid every kind of decision on the question put to Him, it follows that He found in it no reference to the great subjects of His teaching, but treated it as a purely civil or political matter, with which in His ministry He had no concern. Some kind of civil or political collision the question certainly was calculated to provoke: but from the brevity of the narration, and our want of more accurate knowledge of criminal proceedings at the time, it is impossible to lay down definitely, wherein the collision would have consisted." p. 267.

will just remark that the very fact of their questioning thus, 'Moses commanded, but what sayest Thou?' belongs to the last days of the Lord's ministry, and cannot well be introduced chronologically where it here stands: nor does John any where introduce these questions between the law of Moses and Jesus; but the synoptic Gospels often do. The command here mentioned is not to be found, unless 'putting to death' generally, is to be interpreted as = stoning: compare Exod. xxxi. 14 and xxxv. 2, with Num. xv. 35, 36, in which the special order given by God would sanction such a view. But the Rabbis taught "omne mortis supplicium in scriptura absolute positum esse strangulationem." Tract. Sanhedr. ch. x. (Lücke, De Wette.) The passage Ezek. xvi. 38, 40 proves nothing, or proves too much; for it is added, "and thrust thee through I would rather with their swords." suppose that from Deut. xxii. 21, 23, 24, an inference was drawn what kind of a death was intended in ver. 22, the crime being regarded as the same; "he hath humbled his neighbour's wife." We have similar indefiniteness in ib. ver. 25, where evidently the same punishment is meant: see the whole matter discussed in Lücke, ii. 257 ff. 6. $\kappa \alpha \tau \epsilon \gamma$. $\epsilon is \tau$. $\gamma \hat{\eta} v = \delta \pi \epsilon \rho$ εἰώθασι πολλάκις ποιείν οἱ μὴ θέλοντες ανακρίνεσθαι πρώς τους έρωτωντας ακαιρα

It does not follow that any thing was actually written. Stier refers to Jer. xvii. 13, but perhaps without reason. This minute circumstance speaks strongly for the authenticity of the narration.

7.] ἀναμάρτ. is common in the classics: see instances in Lücke. It is not here used in the general sense, 'without sin' (E. V.), nor in the strictest, 'free from the crime of adultery' (it can hardly be that any of the Pharisees should have held themselves sinless,-or that all should have been implicated in adultery): - but - as άμαρτωλός, Luke vii. 37, - of the sin of uncleanness generally. Stier, who contends strongly for the genuineness of this narrative in this place, finds in ver. 46 an allusion to this saying. I cannot say that his attempts to establish a connexion with the subsequent discourse are to me at all satisfactory: I am much more inclined to think with Luthardt (i. 16), that the whole arrangement and plan of our Gospel is broken by 11 απεκρίθη Ίησους και είπεν αυτοίς Κάν έγω ε μαρτυρώ

The Lord Jesus was not sent to be a ruler and a judge in this or that particular case of crime, see Luke xii. 14; but the Ruler and Judge of all: and His answer expresses this, by convicting them all of sin before Him. τόν (see digest), if genuine, refers to the first stone, which by Deut. xvii. 7 the witnesses were to cast.

9. They had said, Tas is curious. τοιαύτας-they now perceive that they themselves were τοιοῦτοι. There is no historical difficulty in this conduct of the Pharisees, as Olshausen finds; -they were struck by the power of the word of Christ. It was a case somewhat analogous to that in which His έγώ είμι struck His foes to the ground, ch. xviii. 6.

The variations of reading are very wide (see digest) in the latter part of the verse. We can hardly (with some) lay any stress on πρεσβυτέρων, as indicating the natural order of conviction of sin. If the consciences of older sinners have heavier loads on them, those of younger κατακρίνω also is not found elsewhere in John, who uses κρίνω in its strict sense for it. The question is evidently so worded for the sake of oude eyw σε κατακρίνω: but it expresses the truth in the depth of their hearts. The Lord's challenge to them would lead to a condemnation by comparison with themselves, if they condemned at all: which they had not done. The words of Jesus were in fact a far deeper and more solemn testimony against the sin than could be any mere penal sentence. And in judging of them we must never forget that He who thus spoke knew the hearts,-and what was the peculiar state of this woman as to penitence. We must not apply in all cases a sentence, which requires His divine knowledge to make it a just one.

19.] Augustine (in Joan. Tract. xxxvii. 2, vol. iii. pt. ii.) and others imagine that the Jews thought of a human father, in thus speaking. But surely before this, as Stier remarks (iv. 370, edn. 2), the Jews must have become accustomed to δπατήρ μου too well to mistake its meaning. It is rather a question asked in mere scorn, by persons who know, but will not recognize, the meaning of a word uttered by another.

21—59.] Further discourses of Jesus The Jews attempt to stone Him. This forms the great conclusion of the series of discourses to the Jews. In it our Lord testifies more plainly still to His divine origin and sinlessness, and to the cause of their unbelief; until at last their enmity is worked up to the highest pitch, and they take up stones to cast at Him. It may be divided into four parts: (1) vv. 21-24,-announcing to them the inevitable consequence of persistence in their unbelief on His withdrawal from them: (2) vv. 25-29,-the things which He has to say and judge of them, and the certainty of their own future recognition of Him and His truthfulness: (3) vv. 30-47, -the first springing up of faith in many of them is by Him corrected and purified from Jewish pride, and the source of such pride and unbelief detected: (4) vv. 48-58, -the accusation of the Jews in ver. 48, gives occasion to Him to set forth very plainly His own divine dignity and præexistence. 21.] The time and place of this discourse are not definitely marked; but in all probability they were the same as before. Only no stress must be laid on the our as connected with ver. 20, for it is only the accustomed carrying forward by the Evangelist of the great self-manifesζητ. με includes the tation of Jesus. idea 'and shall not find me,' which is expressed in ch. vii. 34, 36 :- ye shall continue seeking Me. καὶ ἐν τ. άμ. . . . and shall die (perish) in (not because of (Lampe, Kuinoel)) your sin. proving your ruin' (see on ver. 24).

The words do not refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, but to individual perdition. In these discourses in John, the public judgment of the Jews is not prominently brought forward, as in the other Evangeοπου έγω ύπ. is the consequence, not the cause (by any absolute decree) of their dying in their sins (see ch. vii. 34; xiii. 33). This latter sense would have required ὅπου γάρ. 22.7 It is at least probable that they allude to the idea mentioned by Josephus, himself a Pharisee, in his speech at Jotapata, B. J. iii. 8. 5: - όσοις δέ καθ' έαυτῶν ἐμάνησαν αί χείρες, τούτων μεν άδης δέχεται τάς ψυχας σκοτιώτερος: - and with the bitterest malice taunt Him with thus being about to go where they, the children of Abraham, could never come. δ Ἡρακλέων φησίν ότι πονηρώς διαλογιζόμενοι οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι ταῦτα ἔλεγον, καὶ μείζονας έαυτοὺς ἀποφαινόμενοι τοῦ Σωτῆρος καὶ ὑπολαμβάνοντες ὅτι αὐτοὶ μὲν ἀπελεύσονται πρός τον θεόν είς ανάπαυσιν αιώνιον, δ δὲ Σωτὴρ εἰς φθορὰν καὶ εἰς θάνατον έαυτον διαχειρισάμενος όπου έαυτονς οὐκ έλογιζοντο ἀπελθεῖν. Orig. tom.xix. c. 4, vol. iv. p. 302. De Wette thinks this too refined, and that such a meaning would, if intended, have been marked in our Lord's answer. 23.7 'Ye cannot come where I am going, because we both shall return thither whence we came: I to the Father from Whom $(\tilde{\epsilon}\kappa \tau \tilde{\omega} \nu \ \tilde{\omega} \nu \omega)$ I came: ye to the earth and under the earth (for that more awful meaning surely is not excluded) whence ve came' (ἐκ τῶν κάτω). Then ὁ κόσμος ούτος of course does not only imply 'this present state of things,' but involves the deeper meaning, of the origin of that state of things (see ver. 44) and its end, ver. 24.

24. Since this (ver. 23) is the case, -if ye do not believe that I am He, the Deliverer,—and be renewed by Faith, ye shall die in your sins (plural here, as struck nearer home to their consciences, and implying individual acts of sin, the results of the carnal state). On ἐγώ εἰμι see note, ver. 58. 25.7 Their question follows on έγω ἐκ τῶν ἄνω εἰμί, ver. 23, and the dubious elliptical expression έγώ είμι of the last verse. It is intended to bring out a plain answer on which their enmity might fasten. Our Lord's reply has been found difficult, principally from the ambiguity of ore and ore. No sense can however be given by on which will at all harmonize with the context, notwithstanding Luthardt's defence of it. Lücke's interpretation (edn. 3) after Euthym., "Why do I speak with you at all?" is not only ungrammatical, but most alien from the whole character of our Lord's discourses. I assume then that $\delta \tau_i$ is to be read. Then comes another question: what does laho mean? It has been usually rendered 'say,' or 'tell:' 'even the same that I said unto you from the beginning, E. V. But as De Wette has observed, Aala will not bear this. It is never 'to say' simply, but 'to discourse,' or 'to hold converse,' 'to speak.' Again, what is την άρχην? not to be taken substantively (as Aug., Ambr., Vulg. princi-pium), so as to mean 'The beginning, as pium), so as to mean 'The oeginning, as I, &c.' (so recently, Bp. Wordsw.): but adverbially, with all Greek interpreters (see reff.). And adverbially it may mean (1) 'in the beginning,' 'from the beginning,' but not 'firstly:' (2) 'generally,' 'at all,' 'omnino,' usually with a negative clause, but sometimes with an affirmative. Thus Soph. Antig. 92, ἀρχὴν δὲ θηρῶν οὐ πρέπει τὰμήχανα: Herod. i. 9, ἀρχὴν γὰρ ἐγὼ μηχανήσομαι οὕτω: iv. 25, τοῦτο οὐκ ένδέκομαι την άρχην: Plato, Lysis, p. 265, πως οθν οἱ ἀγαθοὶ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς ἡμῖν φίλοι έσονται την ἀρχήν; See many more examples in Hermann on Viger, p. 722. The common rendering takes the first of these meanings; -but the above remarks on λαλω will set that rendering aside ;and together with the assumption of λαλω = ἔλεξα, the meaning, 'in the beginning,' or 'at first,' or 'from the beginning,' falls to the ground. We have then the second meaning of την ἀρχήν, generally, or 'traced up to its principle,'-for such is the account to be given of this meaning of the word. The rendering of καί, 'even,' and placing it before την άρχ., as done in E. V., is ungrammatical. It must be taken with λαλῶ, being inseparable from it by its position between the relative 8 71 and the verb: as in the clause, δς καὶ παρέδωκεν αὐτόν.

This being premised, the sentence must be rendered (literally) thus: Essentially, that which I also discourse unto you: or In very deed, that same which I speak unto you. He is the Adyos-His discourses are the revelation of Himself." And there is especial propriety in this:—When Moses asked the name of God, "I am that which I AM," was the mysterious answer; the hidden essence of the yet unrevealed One could only be expressed by self-comprehension; but when God manifest in the flesh is asked the same question, it is ' I am that which I SPEAK :' what He reveals Himself to be, that He is (see on next verse). The above sense is maintained by De Wette, and strikingly expanded and illustrated by Stier, iv. 378 Meyer, "Do ye ask, what I have been long telling you?" is ingenious, but seems to be by implication refuted by what has been said above. He gives a good résume of the interpretations. 26.] He is, that which He speaks; and that, He has received from the Father; -He has His definite testimony to give, and His work to do: and therefore, though He has much that He could speak and judge about the Jews, He does it not, but overlooks their malice, -not answering it, -that He may go forward with the haheir eis Tor κόσμον, the revelation of Himself: the αλήθεια of which is all-important, and excludes less weighty things. εἰς τ. κόσ., out into the world, as εἰς τὸν ἀέρα λαλοῦντες, 1 Cor. xiv. 9: see Mark xiii. 10: Luke xxiv. 47. This verse is in the closest connexion with the foregoing.

27.] They did not identify $\delta \pi \epsilon \mu \psi as \mu \epsilon$ with ὁ πατήρ μου. However improbable this may be after ὁ πέμψας με πατήρ, ver. 18 (De Wette), it is stated as a fact; and the Evangelist certainly would not have done so without some sure ground :εἰκὸς αὐτοὺς διαπορεῖν πρὸς ἀλλήλους λέγοντας Τίς ἐστιν δ πέμψας αὐτον; Euthym. There is no accounting for the ignorance of unbelief, as any minister of Chair beauty har projections. of Christ knows by painful experience.

28.] This connects (our being the continuation of the foregoing, see above on ver. 21) with ver. 26, and also with ver. 27, as the τότε γνώσεσθε shews, referring to the οὐκ ἔγνωσαν. τότε γνώσ. Perhaps, in different ways :some, by the power of the Holy Spirit poured out after the exaltation of Christ, and to their own salvation; others by the judgments which were to follow ere long, and to their own dismay and ruin. The construction and connexion of the following appears to be this: καὶ ἀπ' ἐμαυτοῦ depends on ὅτι, and is an expansion of έγω είμι: whereas ver. 29 is an independent assertion. The interchange of moi and lala is remarkable. The construction is not elliptical, so that ποιῶ κ. λαλῶ should be understood in both cases; but the declaration of ver. 25 is still in the Lord's mind, His moieir being all a declaration of the Father, -a hadeiv in the widest sense. Cf. Bengel: "cognoscetis ex re, quod nunc ex verbo non creditis." 29.] ἀφῆκεν, aor. referring to the appointment of the Father by which His work was begun, and which the μετ' έμου έστιν carries on through that work: see ch. xvi. 32. őть, because ;-not 'for,' as if what follows were merely a token that it is so (Olsh.). The τὰ ἀρεστὰ αὐτ. ποιῶ πάντ. is the very essential being of the Son, and is the cause why the Father is ever with Him. 30.7 They believed on Him with a higher degree of faith than those in ch. ii. 23, inasmuch as faith wrought by hearing is higher than that by miracles; but still wanted confirming. 31.] $\dot{\epsilon}\nu \tau\hat{\omega} \lambda. \tau\hat{\omega} \dot{\epsilon}\mu\hat{\omega} = \dot{\epsilon}\nu$ έμοί, ch. xv. 7, though that perhaps is spoken of a deeper entrance into the state of union with Christ. Remaining in His word is not merely obeying His teaching, but is the inner conviction of the truth of that revelation of Himself, which is his λαλιά or λόγος. ἐστέ, for probably they had given some outward token of believing on Him, e.g. that of ranging themselves among His disciples. 32.] In opposition to the mere holding of the truth. And in the continuing increase of this comes true freedom from all fear and error and bond-33.] The answerers are the $\pi\epsilon$ πιστευκότες, not some others among the hearers, as many Commentators (Lampe, Kuinoel, De Wette, Lücke, edn. 3) have maintained; -see, as a proof of this, ver. 36, addressed to these same persons. They had not yet become ἀληθῶs μαθηταί, were not yet distinct from the mass of the unbelieving; and therefore, in speaking to them, He ascribes to them the sins of their race, and addresses them as part of that race. σπέρμα 'Aβ. ἐσμ.] See The assertion οὐδενὶ δεδ. 11; vi. 52), they take the words of our Lord in their outward literal sense. Perhaps this was not always an unintentional misunderstanding. 34.] ποιῶν την άμαρτ., not = άμαρτάνων, for that all do; but = ἐργαζόμενος τὴν ἀνομίαν, Matt. vii. 23. It implies living in the practice of sin, -doing sin, as a habit: see reff. The mere moral sentiment of which this is the spiritual expression, was common among the Greek and Roman philosophers. See Wetstein: also Rom. vi. 12: 2 Pet. ii. 19. 35.] I believe, with Stier and Bengel, the reference to be to Hagar and Ishmael, and Isaac: the bond and the free. They had spoken of themselves as the seed of Abraham. The Lord shews them that there may be. of that seed, two kinds; the son, properly so called, and the slave. The latter does not abide in the house for ever: it is not his right nor his position—'Cast out the bondwoman and her son.' 'But the son abideth ever.' For the application, see on following verses. & δούλος and o vios are in this verse generic merely.

36.] Ye then, being in sin, are carnal: the sons of the bondwoman, and therefore need liberation. Now comes in the spiritual reality, into which the discourse passes from the figure. This liberation can only take place by means of Him of whom Isaac was the type-the Seed according to promise; those only who of His Spirit are born again, and after His image, are ὅντως ἐλεύθεροι—truly sons of God, and no longer children of the bondwoman, but of the free. See by all means Gal. iv. 19 (where the subject really begins, not at ver. 21) to end, which is the best commentary on this verse. There neither is, nor can be here, any allusion either to the liberation of the sabbatical year (Œcolampadius); or to the subject of Heb. iii. 5, 6 (Euthym., after Chrys.). 37.] 'Ye are Abraham's seed, according to the flesh and the covenant: but'-and here the distinction appears - 'ye ποιείτε την άμαρτίαν by seeking to kill Me, because My λόγος (see above on ver. 31) où xwpei-does not work (spread, go forward,—'ne marche pas') in you' (not, among you). 38. We have the same remarkable relation between $\lambda \alpha \lambda \epsilon \hat{\imath} \nu$ and $\pi o \iota \epsilon \hat{\imath} \nu$, as in ver. 28: except that here the ποιείν is applied to the Jews only; λαλείν being used in the same comprehensive sense as there.

But notice the distinction in the restored text between έώρακα παρά τῷ πατρί and ηκούσατε παρά του πατρός, δ πατήρ being a common term, and the articles possessive. [The speaking and doing were in each case from the father of each. But Jesus was πρός του θεόν, in a relation of abiding unity with His Father: they were ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς τοῦ διαβ.,—he was the suggester of their course, the originator of their acts. Jesus was the viós, who remains in the house and sees the father's acts: they the δοῦλοι, merely prescribed to and under bondage. The οὐν implies accordingly, -by the same rule. 39, 40. There is a distinction between σπέρμα and τέκνα. The former our Lord grants that they were (ver. 37), but the latter (by implication—see below on the construction) He denies them. See Rom. ix. 7, οὐ γὰρ πάντες οἱ ἐξ Ἰσραήλ, οὖτοι Ἰσραήλ' οὐδ' ὅτι εἰσὶν σπέρμα ᾿Αβραάμ, πάντες τέκνα. The latter betokens likeness, true genuine descent in character and habits.

The reading in the text is remarkable as connecting together the present έστε and the imperfect έποιείτε. În such a case there must be a suppressed change of meaning between the protasis and the apodosis. The ϵi $\epsilon \sigma \tau \epsilon$ concedes, in a certain sense: the $\epsilon \pi o i \epsilon i \tau \epsilon$ denies, by making an assumption at variance with present fact. The sentence is in fact a combination of a protasis of one form with an apodosis of another. It might have been, (a) εἰ ἔστε..., ποιείτε; or, (b) εἰ ἦτε..., ἐποιείτε. But as it stands, protasis (a) is joined with apodosis (b): and thereby the τέκνα τοῦ ᾿Αβραὰμ εἶναι in any worthy sense is denied, while in the mere formal sense it is conceded.

τοῦτο, this; not, 'tale quid:' and ἐποίησεν, fecit, not 'fecisset:' for the statement is one of a fact:-this did not Abraham, as E. V.: see Gen. xviii. ποιείτε—nct imperative, which destroys the sense. ἐκ πορν.] Stier remarks, that they now let fall Abraham as their father, being convicted of unlikeness to him. They see that a spiritual paternity must be meant, and accordingly refer to God as their Father. This consideration will rule the sense of ἐκ πορν., which must therefore be spiritual also. And spiritually the τέκνα πορνείας, ref. Hosea, are idolaters. πολύθεος δ έκ πόρνης, τυφλώττων περὶ τὸν ἀληθῆ παπέρα, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο πολλοὺς ἀνθ' ἐνὸς γονεῖς αἰνιττόμενος. Philo de Migr. Abr. 13, vol. i. p. 447. Ishmael cannot well be alluded to; for they would not call the relation between Abraham and Hagar one of πορνεία. Still less can Origen's interpretation be adopted, έλεγον 'Ημείς μαλλον ένα πατέρα έχομεν τον θεόν, ήπερ σύ, δ φάσκων μεν έκ παρθένου γεγεννησθαι, έκ πορνείας δέ γεγεννημένος, και διά το αὐχεῖν το ἐκ παρθένου γεγεννήσθαι λέγων ένα πατέρα έχειν μόνον, τον θεόν (tom. xx. 14, p.

327),-for our Lord never proclaimed this of Himself. There may possibly be a reference to the Samaritans (ver. 48), who completely answered in the spiritual sense to the children of fornication: see Deut. xxxi. 16: Isa. i. 21: Ezek. xvi. 42.] 'If you were 15 ff.; xx. 30 al. the children of God, the ethical proof (as Luthardt well calls it) of such descent would be, that you would love Me, who am κατ' έξοχήν the Son of God, and who am come by the mission, and bearing the character, of God.' ήκω conveys the result of έξηλθον, as Meyer; who also remarks that mere sending will not exhaust έξηλθον, which must be taken metaphysically, of the proceeding forth of the Eternal Son from the essence of the 43.] λαλιάν γινώσκειν is to understand the idiom or dialect in which a man speaks, hah. being his manner of speech: see Matt. xxvi. 73, and Cant. iv. 3, LXX. Why do ye not understand my speech? as E.V. But this of course does not here refer to the mere outward ex-pression of the Lord's discourses, but to the spiritual idiom in which He spoke, and which can only be spiritually understood. Then o loyos o euos is the matter of those discourses, the Word itself.
The connexion of the two clauses is, Why,

The connexion of the two clauses is, Why, &c.? Because ye cannot receive, hear with the inner ear (see reff., and ch. vi. 60), that which I say. And the verification and ground of this 'cannot' is in the next verse. Meyer remarks, that in questions and answers, the emphatic words come last—being here γινώσκετε and τὸν λόγον τ. ἐμόν.

44.] The first article

τοῦ is important, and to be rendered (against Meyer) as in E. V., your father the devil. This verse is one of the most decisive testimonies for the objective personality of the devil. It is quite impossible to suppose an accommodation to Jewish views, or a metaphorical form of speech, in so solemn and direct an assertion as this.

θέλετε ποιεῖν is important, and should have been in E. V. more marked: Your will is to do: or, as A. V. R. "ye love to do" [or, are inclined to do]. It indicates, as in ch. v. 40, the freedom of the human will, as the foundation of the condemnation of the sinner.

ανθρωποκτόνος] The most obvious reference seems to be, to the murder of Abel by Cain: see the Apostle's own comment on these words, 1 John iii. 12, 15. But this itself was only a result of the introduction of death by sin, which was the work of the devil: Adam and Eve were the first whom he murdered. But then again both these were only manifes-tations of the fact here stated by divine omniscience respecting him: that he was ανθρωποκτόνος. απ' άρχης, the author and bringer in of that hate which is ανθρωποκτονία, 1 John iii. 15. mention of murder is introduced because the Jews went about to kill Jesus; and the typical parallel of Cain and Abel is certainly hinted at in the words: see Lucke's note, ii. 338 ff., and Stier, iv. 414 (ean. 2) ff. οὐχ ἔστηκεν, not 'abode not,' E. V.; a sense which εστηκα will not bear, being always present in meaning, and = 'I have placed myself,' i. e. I stand : see Matt. xii. 47; xx. 6:

Mark ix. 1; xi. 5: John iii. 29: Acts i. 11; vii. 33: Rom. v. 2; xi. 20 al. fr.: whereas the pluperfect, είστήκειν, ' I had placed myself,' i. e. I stood, is imperfect in sense: see Matt. xii. 46. And that this place forms no exception, is shewn by 570 οὐκ ἔστιν (not ἦν) immediately following. But as the account of this present sense shews, it is not a mere present, but a present dependent on and commencing with an implied past fact. And that fact here is, the fall of the devil, which was not an insulated act, but in which state of apostasy from the truth he ἔστηκεν,—it is his status. So Euthym.: ἐμμένει, ἀναπαύή ἀλήθεια, as De Wette remarks, is objective: the truth of God:-in this he standeth not, because there is no truth ('truthfulness,' subjective) in him. His lie has become his very nature, and therefore he is thoroughly alien from the truth of God. To take ore as 'not the cause, but the proof' (for, i.e. 'for we see it by this, that '....) is not only to do violence to construction, but to overthrow the whole sense of the passage.

τὸ ψεῦδος, a lie; generic: we in English have retained the article in the expression 'to speak the truth,' but not in the corresponding one. He ἐλάλει τὸ ψεῦδος to Eve. ἐκ τ. ἰδ., of his own, as E. V. not, 'according to his character' (De Wette),—but 'out of his own resources,' 'treasures:' see Matt. xii. 35.

sources, 'treasures:' see Matt. xii. 35. ό πατ. αὐτοῦ] i. e. either τοῦ ψεύδουν—(absolutely, or as understood in ψεύστης,—Orig., Euthym., Theophyl., &c. Nitzsch (Theol. Zeitschrift, 1822), De Wette, Lücke, Wordsw., and Winer, § 22. 3. b),—or τοῦ ψεύστου (= τῶν ψευστῶν), of the liar generally. The former is not the fact.—for the devil is not the father τοῦ ψεύδους, but τῶν ψευστῶν, by being himself one whose very nature has become τὸ ψεῦδοs. Certainly by this he has become the author, promoter, of falsehood among men; but this kind of paternity is not here in question: the object being to shew that he was the father of these lying Jews. I therefore hold the latter interpretation, with Bengel, Meyer, and The construction of this passage with the art. before $\pi \alpha \tau \eta \rho$ has presented insuperable difficulty to Bp. Middleton and others: see Midd. in loc. The rendering which he proposes is this: "When (any of you) speaks that which is false, he speaks after the manner of his kindred ($i\kappa \tau \hat{\omega} v i\delta(\omega v!)$), for he is a liar, and so also is his father," i. e. the devil. To which the late Prof. Scholefield proposes an emendation, to take away the comma after ἐστίν, and translate, "For his father also is a liar," not knowing, apparently, that this was the ancient heretical interpretation according to which the mathe αὐτοῦ was the Demiurge: see Meyer, edn. 3, and Hilgenfeld, referred to by him as supporting this rendering. It is really almost incredible that learned men, students of our Lord's discourses, should seriously uphold an interpretation so utterly absurd and preposterous. It is only an instance how the judgment may be warped by the adoption of canons respecting the article grounded on insufficient observation. The instances which Middleton adduces to prove that according to the ordinary rendering, the article must be omitted before $\pi \alpha \tau \dot{\eta} \rho$, none of them touch the question. The article here is emphatic, and could not be omitted, any more than in the sentence έγω είμι δ άρτος της ζωης. The simple account to be given of this construction, is that it = ὅτι ψεύστης ἐστίν, καὶ ὁ πατήρ αὐτῶν: but by ψεύστης being singular, the pronoun is attracted into the singular 45.] 'And the very reason why ye do not believe Me (as contrasted with him) is, because I speak the truth; -you not being of the truth, but of him who is falsehood itself.' This implies a charge of wilful striving against known and recogmized truth. Euthymius fills up the context—εἰ μὲν ἔλεγον ψεῦδος, ἐπιστεύσατέ μοι ἄν, ὡς τὸ Ἰδιον τοῦ πατρὸς ὑμῶν λέγοντι: see ch. v. 43. 46.] ἀμαρτία here is strictly sin: not 'error in argument,' or 'falsehood.' These two latter prophings are found in clerical Grack hat meanings are found in classical Greek, but never in the N. T. or LXX. And besides, they would introduce in this most solemn part of our Lord's discourse, a vapid tautology. The question is an appeal to His sinlessness of life, as evident to them all,—as a pledge for His truthfulness of word: which word asserted, be it remembered, that He was sent from God. And when we recollect that He who here challenges men to convict him of sin, never could have upheld outward spotlessness merely (see Matt. xxiii. 26-28), the words amount to a declaration of His absolute sinlessness, in thought, word, and deed. Or, the connexion may be as stated hy Euthym.: εἰ μὴ διότι τὴν ἀλήθειαν λέγω ἀπιστεῖτέ μοι, εἴπατε, τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν ἐλέγχει με περὶ ἀμαρτίας ὑπ' ἐμοῦ γενομένης, ίνα δόξητε δι' ἐκείνην ἀπιστεῖν;

el άλ. λέγω] And if it be thence (from the impossibility of convicting me of sin) evident, that I speak the truth, why do ye not believe Me? (not πιστ. είς έμέ, but simply μοι, give credence to Me.)

Ver. 47 gives the answer to the διὰ τί, and concludes the discourse with the final disproof of their assertion, ver. 41,-with, as it were, a 'quod erat demonstrandum.'

This verse is cited 1 John iv. 6.

48.7 The Jews attempt no answer, but commence reviling Him. These are now properly of 'Iou8.,—the principal among the Jews. Sam.] So they called 'outcasts from the commonwealth of Israel:' and so afterwards they called the Christians כוחים, from היהה (2 Kings xvii. 24). They imply, that He differed from their interpretation of the law, -or perhaps, as He had convicted them of not being the genuine children of Abraham, they cast back the charge with a senseless 'Tu quoque.' There may perhaps be a reference to the occurrence related in ch. iv. 5 ff.; but Schöttgen (p. 371) has shewn that "Samaritanus es" is found in the Rabbis as addressed to one whose word is not to be believed. K. Saip. Ex.] "As in the first clause they sundered Him from the communion of Israel, so now from that of Israel's God." Stier. Or perhaps they mean the reproach more as expressing aggravated madness owing to demoniacal possession. The καλώς λέγομεν connects with the charge twice brought against Him by the Pharisees, 'of casting out devils by the prince of the devils.'

49. The former term of reproach Jesus passes over ("cum jam inter Samaritanos haberet, qui in eum credebant." Lampe; but qu.?), and mildly answers (1 Pet. ii. 23) the malicious charge of having a devil, by an appeal to his whole life and teaching (see ch. iv. 34), which was not the work of one having a devil. There is no retort of the charge in the emphatic ἐγώ, as Cyr. and Lücke; this, as Meyer observes, would have required our eyw. At present the έγω followed by ὑμεῖς only brings out the two parties into stronger contrast.

κ. ὑμ. ἀτιμ. με] The ἐγώ and ὑμεῖς correspond strictly to the huels and ov of the preceding verse. 'Our mutual relation is not that, but this: that I honour Him that sent me, and ye, in dishonouring me, dishonour Him.' It is the same contrast, the έκ τοῦ θεοῦ and οὐκ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, as before, ver. 47, which lies at the root.

50.7 'Ye dishonour me; -not that I seek my own honour, but His who sent me. There is One who seeketh my honour (ch. v. 23), and will have me honoured; and who judgeth between me and you, between truth and falsehood.' ply τ. δόξαν μου after ζητῶν, but not after κρίνων. 51.] There is no pause (De Wette) between ver. 50 and this. This is the direct carrying on of the discourse, arising out of κρίνων in the last τὸν ἐμ. λόγ. τηρ., as ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τῷ ἐμῷ μένειν, ver. 31, is not only outward obedience, but the endurance in, and obedience of faith. θεωρείν θάν., as γεύεσθαι θαν., is a Hebraism for to die,see reff.,-and must not be pressed to mean, 'shall not feel (the bitterness of) death,' in a temporal sense, as has been done by Stier (iv. 433, edn. 2). The death of the body is not reckoned as death, any more than the life of the body is life, in our Lord's discourses: see ch. xi. 25. 26, and notes. Both words have a deeper 52, 53.] The Jews, not knowing what death really imports, regard the saying as a decisive proof of their surmise ver. 48. "Their misunderstanding (says De Wette) keeps to the wellknown type (ch. iii. 4; iv. 11 ff.), but this time theocratic pride is added to carnal sensuousness:- 'the O. T. Saints died!'"

54, 55.] The argument in these verses is: 'The same God who is the God of Abraham, is my Father; -He it is who honours (glorifies) me, and it is His word that I keep. I was promised by Him to Abraham. δοξάσω, 'glorify myself to this high designation, of being able to deliver from death.' ον λέγ. Whom you are in the habit of calling your God (for so of course the θεδς ήμων imports)i. e. the God of Israel. A most important identification, from the mouth of our Lord Himself, of the Father, with the God of Israel in the O. T. The Kai here is not 'but,' nor 'although;' the sense is, of Whom ye say 'He is our God,' and know Him not. Then what follows sets forth the contrast between them, the pretended children of Abraham, who know not Abraham's God (the liars), and Him who knows Him, and keeps His word, so that His word works in and by Him; yea, He is & λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ. His allowing their denial of this state of knowledge and union would be as great a lie in Him, as their assumption of it was in them. ύμῶν (instead of the more usual ὑμῖν) signifies the being 'one of them;' as we say, 56. The Lord 'the like of them.' does not deny them their outward title of children of Abraham :- it is of spiritual things that He has been speaking, in refusing them the reality of it. ήγαλλ. ίνα ίδη, rejoiced, that He should see; not (Grotius, Calov., Kuin., &c.) "wished that he might see." The object of his joy is treated as its purpose. The intent is to shew that Abraham did in his time keep Christ's word, viz. by a prospective realizing faith; and therefore that he, in the sense of ver. 51, had not seen death. This is expressed by κ. είδεν κ. εχάρη: see below. But what is τ. ήμ. τ. εμήν? Certainly, the day of Christ's appearance in the flesh (δ τῆς ἐπιδημίας αὐτοῦ καιρός, Cyril Alex.). When that was over, and the attention was directed to another and future appearance, the word came to be used of His second coming, 1 Cor. i. 8, &c. &c. But this, as well as the day of His Cross (Euthym, al.), is out of the question here; -and the word Rabbinically was used for the time of the Messiah's appearance. So we have it, Luke xvii. 22, 26: but here as there, the expression must not be limited exclusively to the former appearance. From the sense it is evident that Abraham saw by faith and will see in fact, not the first coming only, but that which it introduces and implies, the second also. Technically however, in the form of the sentence here, the First is mainly in view. And to see that day, is to be present at, witness, it;-to have experience of it. K. ELBEV K.

έχάρη, viz. in his Paradisiacal state of bliss. Maldonatus has a striking note here (ii. 710): "Cum dicit, vidit, haud dubium quin eo modo vidisse dicat, quo videre dixerat tantopere concupivisse. Non autem concupiverat sola videre fide quia fide jam Christi diem videbat. . . . Vidit ergo diem Christi re ipsa, quemadmodum et ille et patres omnes videre concupiverant. Non quod vivus viderit, sed quod mortuus Christum venisse noverit, tempusque illud exactum esse quod usque ad ejus adventum a Deo constitutum fuisse sciebat. Quod enim dicit, Exsultavit ut videret diem meum, perinde valet ac si diceret, Cupivit ut veniret dies meus : venit, et gavisus est. Quis enim dubitet Abraham et cæteros patres qui cum eo erant (sive ex revelatione, quam in hac vita habuissent, sive ex revelatione, quam tunc, quum Christus venit, habuerint de ejus adventu) non ignorasse Christum venisse, etiam antequam ad eos post mortem veniret?" Only that I would rather believe, as Stier does (iv. 444 f. edn. 2), that the 'seeing of Christ's day' was not by revelation, but actual-the seeing of a witness. 'Abraham then has not seen death, but lives through my word;having believed and rejoiced in the promise of Me, whom he has now seen manifest in the flesh.' Meyer quotes the Socinian interpretation as a specimen of "monstrous perversion:" "exultaturus fuisset et si vidisset, omnino fuisset gavisurus."

57.] No inference can be drawn from this verse as to the age of our Lord at the time, according to the flesh. Fifty years was with the Jews the completion of manhood. The reading τεσσαράκοντα—found in Cod. Λ, and read by Chrys., of which Euthym. says, ὅπερ δοκεῖ ἀκρι- $\beta \epsilon \sigma \tau \epsilon \rho \rho \nu$,—has probably been introduced for that very reason. 58.] As Lücke remarks, all unbiassed exegesis of these words must recognize in them a declaration of the essential præ-existence of Christ. "before Abraham became Abraham," i. e. father of many nations (Socinus and others), and of eyw cipi, as "I was predetermined, promised by God" (Grotius and the Socinian interpreters), are little better than dishonest quibbles. The distinction between γενέσθαι and είμί is important. "Antequam nasceretur Abraham, ego sum" (Erasmus). The present elui expresses essential existence, as in reff., especially Col. i. 17, and was often used by our Lord to assert His In this verse the God-Divine Being. head of Christ is involved; and this the Jews clearly understood, by their conduct 59.] Probably there were to Him. stones (for building) lying about in the outer court of the temple, where these words seem to have been spoken. The reason of the Jews' doing this is given by them on a similar occasion, ch. x. 33, 871 σὰ ἄνθρωπος ὧν ποιείς σεαυτὸν θεόν.
There does not appear to be any

and go out of the temple.

CHAP. IX. X. JESUS THE LIGHT, FOR THE HEALING OF THE WORLD AND THE JUDGMENT OF THE JEWS. IX. 1-41. Manifestation of Jesus as the Light by a miracle. Judgment of the Jews by the healed man, and by Jesus. This, if the concluding words of ch. viii. in the rec. are genuine, would appear to have happened on the same day [as the incidents there related], which is hardly likely, for we should thus have the whole incidents from ch. vii. 37 (omitting ch. vii. 53-viii. 12), belonging to one day, and that day a sabbath (ver. 14). And besides, the circumstances under which Jesus here appears are too usual and tranquil to have succeeded immediately to His escape in ch. viii. 59. I would rather therefore suppose that there is a break before this verse: how long, we cannot of course say. Thus we have the commencement of a new narrative here, as in ch. vi. 1, and vii. 1. This is the view of Lücke, Tholuck, and De Wette; Olshausen, Meyer, and Stier believe it to have been the same day; and the former refers the $\hat{\eta}\nu$ $\sigma \hat{\alpha}\beta$. (ver. 14) to its being the last day of the feast (ch. vii. 37, where see note). The blind man was sitting begging (ver. 8), possibly proclaiming the fact of his having been so born; for otherwise the disciples could hardly have asked the following question. The incident may have been in the neigh bourhood of the temple (Acts iii. 2): but doubtless there were other places where beggars sat, besides the temple entrances.

2.] According to Jewish ideas, every infirmity was the punishment of sin (see ver. 34). From Exod. xx. 5, and the prevailing views on the subject, the disciples may have believed that the man was visited for the sins of his parents: but how could he himself have sinned before his birth? Beza and Grotius refer the question to the doctrine of metempsychosis; that he may have sinned in a former state of existence; this however is disproved by Lightfoot and Lampe. The Pharisees believed that the good souls only passed into other bodies, which would exclude this case (see Jos. Antt. xviii.

1. 3, and B. J. ii. 8. 14). Lightfoot, Lücke, and Meyer refer it to the possibility of sin in the womb; Tholuck to predestinated sin, punished by anticipation: De Wette to the general doctrine of the præ-existence of souls, which pre-vailed both among the Rabbis and Alexandrians: see Wisd. viii. 19, 20 (the applicability of which passage is doubted by Stier, iv. 455 note, edn. 2). So Isidore of Pelusium in the Catena (Lücke, ii. 372), οδτος, ώς φασιν Έλληνες,—ή οι γονείς αὐτοῦ, ώς φασιν Ίουδαΐοι. The question may have been asked vaguely without any strict application of it to the circumstances, merely taking for granted that some sin must have led to the blindness, and hardly thinking of the nonapplicability of one of the suppositions to this case. Or perhaps, as Stier inclines to suppose, the ούτος, ή may mean, 'this man, or, for that is out of the question (biefer felbft, oder, ba uns dies boch nicht bentbar ist, . . .), his parents?'

In the economy of God's Providence, his suffering had its place and aim, and this was to bring out the έργα τ. θεοῦ in his being healed by the Redeemer (see Rom. xi. 11 and note). So Lücke:-De Wette denies the interpretation, and refers the saying merely to the view of our Lord to bring out his own practical design, to make use of this man to prove His divine power. But see ch. xi. 4, which is strictly parallel.
4.] Connected by ἐργάζ, τὰ ἔργα to the former verse. There certainly seems to be some reference to its being the sabbath; see the similar expressions in ch. v. 17. From ὅταν . . . , in ver. 5, it seems evident that ἡμέρα is the appointed course of the working of Jesus on earth, and vút the close of it (see the parallel, ch. xi. 9, 10). It is true, that, according to John's universal diction, the death of Jesus is His glorification; but the similitude here regards the effect on the world, see ver. 5; and the language of Rom. xiii. 12 is in accordance with it, as also Luke xxii. 53: John xiv. 30. 5.] This partly explains the $\dot{\eta}\mu$ and $\nu\dot{\nu}\dot{\xi}$ of the former verse, partly alludes to the nature of the healing about to take place. As before the raising of Lazarus (ch. xi. 25), He states that He is the Resurrection and the Life; so now, He sets forth Himself as the source of the archetypal spiritual light, of which the natural, now about to be conferred, is only a derivation and symbol.

6. See reff. Mark. The virtue especially of the saliva jejuna, in cases of disorders of the eyes, was well known to antiquity. Pliny, H. N. xxviii. 7, says, "Lippitudines matutina quotidie velut inunctione arceri." In both accounts (Suet. Vesp. 7: Tacitus, Hist. iv. 8) of the restoring of a blind man to sight attributed to Vespasian, the use of this remedy occurs. See also Wetstein in loc. (Trench, Miracles, 293 note, edn. 2). The use of clay also for healing the eyes was not unknown. Serenus Samonicus (in the time of Caracalla) says: "Si tumor insolitus typho se tollat inani, Turgentes oculos vili circumline como.

No rule can be laid down which our Lord may seem to have observed, as to using, or dispensing with, the ordinary human means of healing. He Himself determined by considerations which are

It may have been as part of the cure, -or merely to wash off the clay. The former is most probable, especially as the els must be taken with νίψαι, not with ὕπαγε, and thus would imply immersion in the pool. So Athen. x. p. 438 F (in Meyer), λούεσθαι A beggar blind είς λουτρώνας. from his birth would know the localities sufficiently to be able to find his way; so that there is no necessity to suppose a partial restoration of sight before his The situation of the fountain and pool of Siloam is very doubtful. Robinson makes both at the mouth of the ancient Tyropæon, s.E. of the city. He himself explored a subterranean passage from this spot to the Fountain of the Virgin higher up on the banks of the Kedron. Josephus, B. J. v. 4. 1, says, ή δὲ τῶν τυροποιῶν προςαγορευομένη φάραγξ . . . καθήκει μέχρι Σιλωάμ ούτω γὰρ τὴν πηγήν, γλυκείάν τε καὶ πολλην οὖσαν, εκαλοῦμεν. Jerome sets it "ad radices montis Zion" (on Isa. viii. 6), and mentions its intermittent character: but he also says (on Matt. x. 28), "ad radices montis Moria, in quibus Silon fluit:" so that his testimony exactly agrees with Josephus and Robinson (see Robins. i. 493 ff., and The Land and the Book, pp. 659 ff.). It is mentioned Neh. iii. 15: Isa.

On the subject of a recent suggestion respecting the identity of Siloam and Bethesda, see supplementary note at the end of this volume. ο έρμ. ἀπεστ.] The reason of this derivation (Σιλωάμ = וֹשֶׁלוֹת) being stated has been much doubted. Some (e. g. Lücke) consider the words to have been inserted as an early gloss of some allegorical interpreter. But there is no external authority for this; every Ms. and version containing them, except the Syr. and Pers. Euthym. says, oluar δια τον απεσταλμένον έκει τότε τυφλόν. So also Nonnus: ὕδωρ στελλομένοιο προώνυμον ἐκ σέο πομπης: and Meyer takes this view. But it would be a violent transfer, -of the name of the fountain, to the man who was sent thither. I should rather regard the healing virtue imparted to the water to be denoted, as symbolical of Himwho was sent, and whose mission it was to give the healing water of life. Aug., Chrys., Thl., Erasm., Beza, Calvin, &c., and Ebrard and Luthardt, similarly refer ἀπεσταλ. to the Lord Jesus: Stier, to the Holy Spirit,-but as one with, and proηλθεν, came ceeding from Christ. back; -apparently to his own house, by the next verse. 8.] θεωροῦντες belongs to to πρότερον, and thus expresses the present relatively to that time, - οὶ ἦσαν τὸ πρότ. θεωροῦντες. The choice of the word θεωροῦντες implies attention and habit. ing τυφλός was most likely a correction of some one who thought προςαίτης did not express plainly enough the change in him. The question of identity would be much more likely to turn on whether he was really the person who had sat and begged (the blindness being involved in it), than on the fact of his having been blind.

11.] ἀνέβλ., strictly speaking, is inappropriate in the case of one born blind. Lücke refers to Aristotle as using the word thus, and cites Pausanias, who speaks of 'Οφιονέα τον έκ γενετής τυφλόν, whom ἐπέλαβε τῆς κεφαλῆς ἄλγημα ἰσχυ-ρόν, καὶ ἀνέβλεψεν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ. Sight being natural to men, the deprivation of it is regarded as a loss, and the reception of it, though never enjoyed before, as a recovery. So Grotius: "nec male recipere quis dicitur, quod communiter tributum humanæ naturæ ipsi abfuit." There is no emphasis on µov here (as Bp. Wordsw.) nor in vv. 15, 30: nor on σου in vv. 10, 17, 26. See on Matt. xvi. 18, and compare Luke xii. 18. 13.7 The neighbours appear to have brought him to the Pharisees, out of hostility to Jesus

(see ver. 12): and ver. 14 alleges the reason of this: - or perhaps from fear of the sentence alluded to in ver. 22. The 'Pharisees' here may have been the court presiding over the synagogue, or one of the lesser local courts of Sanhedrim. Lücke inclines to think they were an assembly of the great Sanhedrim, whom John sometimes names οί Φαρ.: see ch. vii. 47; xi. 46: Meyer regards them as some formal section of the Pharisees, as a body: but were there such? 14.] Lightf. cites from a Rabbinical treatise on the Sabbath, "sputum etiam super palpebras poni prohibitum." But the making the clay, as a servile work, seems to be here prominently mentioned. Meyer notices,-and it is interesting, as a minute mark of accuracy, -that the man only relates what he himself, as being blind, had felt: he says nothing of the spittle. 15.] πάλιν refers to ver. 10. 19.7 The question is threefold, and in strict legal formality: 'Is this your son? Was he born blind? How is it that he now sees?' 21.] Notice the emphatic αὐτοῦ-ἡμεῖς-αὐτόν-αὐ-22.] It is not said when this resolution was come to; and this also speaks for an interval between ch. vii. viii., and this incident. It could hardly have been before the council at the conclusion of ch. vii. ἀποσυν.] Probably the first of the three stages of Jewish excommunication.—the being shut out from the synagogue and household for thirty days, but without any anathema. The other two,-the repetition of the above, accompanied by a curse,-and final exclusion,would be too harsh, and perhaps were not in use so early. Trench (Mirr. 299, edn. 2) regards the resolution not as a token that the Sanhedrim had pronounced Him a false Christ, but as shewing that they forbade a private man to anticipate their decision on this point by confessing Him (?). δòs δ. τ. θεω Not, 'Give God the praise'

25. w/ See on ver. 8. The man shrewdly evades the inference and states again the simple fact. Bear in mind, that ww must here be strictly kept to its present sense, as being joined with a present verb βλέπω: the rule for the construction of a pres. part. being, that it is contemporaneous with the verb which rules the time of the sentence. So that we must render, not 'whereas I was blind, now I see,' as E. V.: but as A. V. R., being a blind man [or, though a blind man], now I see. The shrewd and naïve disposition of the man furnishes the key to the ænigmatical expression. He puts it to them as the problem, the fact of which he knows for certain but the reason of which it was for them to solve, that he, whom they all

The latter clause is of course ironical: 'you seem so anxious to hear particulars about Him, that you must surely be intending to become His disciples.' 29. λελάληκεν, not έλάλησεν, is important: it betokens the abiding finality of God's revelation to Moses, in their estimation: q. d. He expresses a general popular conviction, that one who could do these things, must be a pious man: and (ver. 32) very eminently so, since this miracle was unprecedented. Ver. 32, says Meyer, is the minor proposition: ver. 33, the conclusion;

ποντες here answer to the ισχύοντες and δίκαιοι of Matt. ix. 12, 13: see note there. 40. They ask the question, not understanding the words of Jesus in a bodily sense, but well aware of their meaning, and scornfully rejoining, 'Are then we meant by these blind, we, the leaders of the people?' 41.] The distinction in expression between the two clauses must be carefully borne in mind. Our Lord is referring primarily to the unbelief of the Pharisees and their rejection of Him. Aud He says, 'If ye were really blind (not, 'confessed yourselves blind:' Kuinoel, Stier, De Wette), ye would not have incurred guilt; but now ye say, "We see;" ye believe ye have the light, and boast that ye know and use the light; and therefore your guilt abideth, remaineth on you.' Observe there is a middle clause understood, between 've would never have incurred guilt,' and 'your guilt remaineth;' and that is, 'ye have incurred guilt;' which makes it necessary to take the \(\lambda\epsilon\)γετε ότι βλέπομεν as in a certain sense implying βλέπετε: viz. ' by the Scriptures being committed to you, by God's grace, which ought to have led you to faith in me.' CHAP. X. 1—21.] Of true and false shepherds. Jesus the good Shepherd. This discourse is connected with the preceding miracle; and the conduct of the Pharisees towards the man who had been blind, seems to have given occasion to this description of false shepherds, which again introduces the testimony of Jesus to Himself as the true Shepherd. So that, as Meyer remarks, the paragraph should begin at ch. ix. 35 properly. The more we study carefully this wonderful Gospel, the more we shall see that the idea of this close connexion is never to be summarily dismissed as imaginary, and that our Evangelist never "passes without notice to an entirely different and disjointed occurrence or discourse," as I stated in some of my earlier editions. See on the whole subject of the parable, Jer. xxiii. 1—4: Ezek. xxxiv.: Zech. xi. 4—17. These xxxiv.: Zech. xi. 4—17. opening verses (to ver. 5) set forth the distinction between false and true shepherds. Then (vv. 7, 8, 9) He brings in Himself, as the door, by which both shepherds and sheep enter the fold. (ver. 10) He returns to the imagery of the first verses, and sets forth Himself as THE GOOD SHEPHERD; and the rest (to ver. 18) is occupied with the results and distinctions dependent on that fact.

1. την αὐλ.] δ περιτετειχισμένος κ. ὕπαιθρος τόπος (Phavorinus, Lücke ii. 403); just answering, except in this being a permanent enclosure, to our fold. This fold is the visible Church of God, primarily, as His people Israel were His peculiar fold; the possibility of there being other folds has been supposed to be alluded to in ver. 16: but see note there.

The terms in this first part are general, and apply to all leaders of God's people; in ver. 1, to those who enter that office without having come in by the door (i. e. Christ, in the large sense, in which the O. T. faithful looked to and trusted in Him, as the covenant promise of Israel's God); and in ver. 2 to those who do enter this way; and whosoever does is the shepherd of the sheep (not emphatic,—not, 'the Good Shepherd,' as below, ver. 11, but here it is merely predicated of one who thus enters, that he is the shepherd of that particular fold: it is the attribute of a shepherd thus to enter). sheep throughout this parable are not the mingled multitude of good and bad; but the real sheep, the faithful, who are, what all in the fold should be. The false sheep (goats, Matt. xxv. 32) do not appear; for it is not the character of the flock, but that of the shepherd, and the relation between him and his sheep, which is here prominent.

3.] Perhaps the θυρωρός should not be too much pressed as significant; but certainly the Holy Spirit is especially He who opens the door to the shepherds: see frequent uses of this symbolism by the Apostles, Acts xiv. 27: 1 Cor. xvi. 9: 2 Cor. ii. 12: Col. iv. 3;-and instances of the θυρωρός shutting the door, Acts xvi. 6, 7. (So Theodorus Heracleota, and Stier, iv. 482, edn. 2.) τὰ πρόβ. τ. φων. αὐτ. ἀκ.] The voice of every such true shepherd is heard (heeded, understood) by the sheep (generally): and he calls by name his own sheep, that portion of the great flock entrusted to him, and leads them out to pasture, as his office is.

This distinction between τὰ πρόβ. ana τὰ ἴδια πρόβ. has given rise to exegetical and doctrinal mistakes, from not observing ποιμήν above. It has been imagined that Christ is here spoken of, and that therefore these two descriptions of sheep must be different, and so the whole exposition has been confused. Even Stier has fallen into this mistake. he has led forth ($\epsilon \kappa \beta \hat{a} \lambda \lambda \epsilon \iota \nu = \epsilon \xi \hat{a} \gamma \epsilon \iota \nu$) to pasture all his sheep (there shall not an hoof be left behind), he goes before them (see The Land and the Book, p. 202); in his teaching pointing out the way to them; they follow him, because they know his voice; his words and teaching are familiar to them. But observe that the expression here becomes again more general; not τὰ ίδ. πρ., but τὰ πρ. as in ver. 3. The sheep know the voice of every true shep-5.] So that the ἀλλότριος is not the shepherd of another section of the flock, but an alien: the ληστής of ver. 1; —and τῶν ἀλλ. is generic, as in E. V. Meyer takes it as merely meaning a stranger, one who is not their Shepherd: but this hardly seems strong enough for the context. 6.] $\pi \alpha \rho o \iota \mu \iota \alpha$ is not $= \pi \alpha \rho \alpha - \beta o \lambda \dot{\eta}$, as so generally set down. This is not properly a parable: but rather a parabolic allegory. The parable requires nar-rative to set it forth; and John relates no such. The right word for παροιμία would be allegory: etymologically it is, any saying diverging from the common way of speech $(\pi \alpha \rho' \ ol\mu o\nu)$: cf. Meyer. We have other examples in ch. xv. 1 ff. and in Matt. ix. 37, 38. 7.7 What follows is not so much an exposition, as an expansion of the allegory. The key to this verse is the right understanding of what went before. Bear in mind, that vv. 1-5 were of shepherds in general. But these shepherds themselves go into and out of the fold by the same door as the sheep: and Christ is that door; THE DOOR OF THE SHEEP: the one door both for sheep and shepherds, into the fold (see ή θύρα, absol. ver. 9), into God's Church, to the Father. 8.7 I believe that the right sense of these words, ὄσοι ἡλθον πρὸ ἐμοῦ, has not been apprehended by any of the Commentators. First, they can only be honestly understood of time: all who came before me (not, "without regard to me," Olsh. &c., nor "passing by me as the door," Camer., nor "instead of me," Lampe, &c.: nor "pressing before me," ch. v. 7, which would have been έρχονται, not ηλθ.: nor "before taking the trouble to find me, the door," Stier, iv. 492, edn. 2: nor any other of the numerous shifts which What pretended have been adopted). teachers then came before Christ? member the connexion of these discourses. He has taught the Jews that Abraham and the Prophets entered by Him (ch. viii. 56): but He has set in strong opposition to Himself and His, them (these Jews) and their father, the Devil (ib. ver. 44). He was "the first thief who clomb into God's fold;" and all his followers are here spoken of inclusively in the language of the allegory, as coming in by and with him. His was the first attempt to lead human nature, before Christ came; before the series of dispensations of grace began, in which pasture and life is offered Meyer understands to man by Him. the Pharisees, &c. who taught the people before Christ appeared as the Door of the sheep: but this does not seem to reach the depth of the requirements of the sayeloiv, not noav, because their essential nature as belonging to and being of the evil one is set forth, and the inclusion of these present Pharisees in their ranks. å\lambda' o\dotk . . .] This of course cannot be understood absolutely,—"the sheep never for one moment listened to them;' but, did not listen to them in the sense of becoming their disciples eventually. So that the fall of our first Parents would be no exception to this; whom of all men we must conclude, by the continuing grace and mercy of God to them after that fall, to have been of His real sheep. And since then, the same is true; however the sheep may for a while listen to these false shepherds, they do not hear them, so as to follow them. Those who do, belong not to the true flock.

Ver. 9 expands and fixes ver. 7. "Non est salutaris aditus in ecclesiam, nisi per me, sive pastor esse velis, sive ovis." Erasmus, Paraphr. See Num. xxvii. 16, 17. The sequel of the verse shews that this combined meaning is the true one. Meyer, who understands it all of shepherds alone, finds great difficulty in the interpretation of the latter words: "shall go in and out before the sheep, and find pasture for them." Ver. 10 shews the gracious intent of the Saviour in this ;-to give life, and in abundance. This verse forms the transition from Him as ή θύρα, to Him as δ ποιμήν. He is here set in opposition to δ κλέπτης (see on ver. 8), and thus insensibly passes into the place of a ποιμήν, who has been hitherto thus opposed. and καὶ περισ. έχ.: q. d. not merely as a door to pass through, but actively, abundantly, to bestow abundance of life. We are thus prepared for (ver. 11) the announcement of Himself as ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλός—the great antagonist of δ κλέπτης -the pattern and Head of all good shepherds, as he of all thieves and robbers: the Messiah, in His best known and most loving office: cf. Ezek. xxxiv. 11-16, 23; xxxvii. 24, and Isa. xl. 11. But He is ὁ π. δ κ. in this verse, as having most eminently the qualities of a good shepherd, one of which is to lay down His life for the sheep. These words here are not so much a prophecy, as a declaration, implying however that which ver. 15 asserts expli-12.] The imagery is here again somewhat changed. The false shepherds are here compared to hirelings, i.e. those who serve merely for gain; the μισθωτός who fulfils the character implied by the word. The idea is brought in by $\tau \dot{\eta} \nu \psi \nu \chi$. $a\dot{\nu}\tau$. $\tau i\theta$. $\dot{\nu}\pi\dot{\epsilon}\rho$ τ . $\pi\rho$., which introduces a time of danger, when the true and false shepherds are distinguished. The purposes of this wolf are the same as those of the thief in ver. 10, and in the allegory he is the same;—the great Foe of the sheep of Christ. Lücke and De

Wette deny this, and hold 'any enemies of the theocracy' to be meant; -but no deep view of the parable will be content with this,—see Matt. vii. 15, where the λύκοι άρπαγες are ψευδοπροφήται, the κλέπται κ. λησταί of ver. 8; and their chief and father would therefore be ὁ λύκος, just as ὁ ποιμήν is the Shepherd. The knowledge of His sheep here spoken of is more than the mere knowing by name: it is a knowledge corresponding to the Father's knowledge of Him ;-i. e. entire, perfect, all-comprehensive: and their knowledge of Him corresponds to His of the Father,-i. e. is intimate, direct, and personal: both being bound together by holy and inseparable Love. Beware of rendering [the former clause of] ver. 15 as in E. V. as an independent sentence, ' As my Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father: ' it is merely the sequel to ver. 14, and should stand, as the Father knoweth me and I know the Father. ὑπὲρ τ. προβ.] for those my sheep—not, for all; that, however true, is not the point brought out here: the Lord lays down His life strictly and properly, and in the depths of the Divine counsel, for those who are His sheep. 16.] The άλλα πρόβ. are the Gentiles; -not the dispersion of the Jews,

The Lord speaks of His bringing them, and their hearing His voice: meaning that His servants in His name and by His power would accomplish this work. Admirably illustrative of the converse method of speaking which He employs Matt. xxv. 40, 45. The μία ποίμνη is remarkable—not μία αὐλή, as characteristically, but erroneously rendered in E.V.: - not one fold, but one FLOCK; no one exclusive enclosure of an outward church,—but one flock, all knowing the one Shepherd and known of Him. On είς ποιμήν compare Heb. xiii.

17. The λαλείν ἐν παροιμίαιs is now over, and He speaks plainly,-My Father. In this wonderful verse lies the mystery of the love of the Father for the Son; because the Son has condescended to the work of humiliation, and to earn the crown through the cross (see Phil. ii. 8, 9, διό). The iva here is strictly τελικόν, in order that. "Without this purpose in view," says Stier (iv. 504, edn. 2), "the Death of Christ would neither be lawful nor possible." 18.7 The truth of this voluntary rendering up was shewn by His whole sufferings, from the falling of His enemies to the ground in the garden (ch. xviii. 6) to His last words, παρατίθεμαι τδ πν. μου, Luke xxiii. 46 (see note there). His resurrection also was eminently His own work, by virtue of the Spirit of the Father dwelling in and filling Him: the ¿ξουσία in both these cases being the ἐντολή, appointment, ordinance of the Father, from the counsel of whose will the whole mediaH τa €pya ...

22-39.] Discourse at the Feast of Dedication. It may be, that Jesus remained at, or in the neighbourhood of, Jerusalem during the interval (two months) between the Feast of Tabernacles and that of the Dedication. Had He returned to Galilee, we should have expected some mention of it. Still, by the words ev τοις 'Ιεροσολύμοις, it would seem as if a fresh period and a new visit began; for why should such a specification be made, if the narrative proceeded continuously? See on Luke ix. 51 ff. 22. This feast had become usual since the time when Judas Maccabæus purified the temple from the profanations of Antiochus. It was held on Chisleu (December) 25, and seven following days: see 1 Macc. iv. 41-59: 2 Macc. x. 1-8: Jos. Antt. xii. 7. 7.

χειμ. ην] it was winter (not 'stormy weather,' as Lampe, al.: Matt. xvi. 3): see weather, as Lampe, al.: Matt. xvi. 3): see above. The notice is inserted to explain to Gentile readers the reason of our Lord's walking in Solomon's portico. This latter was on the east side of the temple, called was on the east side of the temper, the says, also by Jos. στοὰ ἀνατολική. He says, Antt. xx. 9. 7, that it was an original work of Solomon, which had remained from the former temple.

24.] ψυχήν aipers is generally explained, 'keep us in doubt,' αίωρεις, αναρτάς μεταξύ πίστεως κ. απιστίαs, Euthym. But there is some question whether ψ , $\alpha i \rho$, is ever so used. In Josephus, it signifies 'to uplift the soul,' 'raise the courage;' ἐπὶ τὸν κίνδ. τὰs ψ. ἦρμένοι, Antt. iii. 2. 3; 5. 1. So also Aquila, Prov. xix. 18, πρδς το θανατωσαι αὐτὸν μὴ ἄρης ψ. σου. See also Ps. lxxxv. 4; cxlii. 8 (LXX). These usages, however, as all the examples adduced in the comm., are confined to the act of a man on his own soul: when the term applies to effects produced on another, it seems to imply any strong excitement of mind, whether for hope or fear. How long dost thou excite our minds?

25. He had often told them, in unmistakable descriptions of Himself; see ch. v. 19; viii. 36, 56, 58, &c. &c. But the great reference here is to His works, as Observe the sharp contrast of eyw and bueis. 26. The difficulty of καθώς εἶπον ὑμῖν is considerable warrant for its genuineness: and it comes much more naturally with this than with the following verse. I believe it to refer more to the whole allegory, than to any explicit saying of this kind; and this is shewn to my mind by the following words in ver. 27:—the minor proposition, 'but ye hear not my voice,' being understood. This was a corollary from the allegory, and thus it might be said καθώς εἶπον ὑμῖν. This reference to the allegory some two months after it was spoken, has been used by the rationalists as an argument against the authenticity of the narrative. But, as Meyer observes, it in reality implies that the conflict with the Jewish authorities is here again taken up after that interval, during which it had not broken 27-29. This leads to a further description of these sheep. The form of the sentence is a climax; rising through the έγω δίδωμι and έκ τ. χ. μου, to ό πατήρ μου δ δέδωκέν μοι and έκ τ. χ. τοῦ πατρός. Then the apparent diversity of the two expressions, έκ τ. χ. μου and $\epsilon \kappa \tau$. χ . τ 00 π 0 τ . μ 0 ν 0, gives occasion to the assertion in ver. 30, that Christ and the Father are ONE; one in essence primarily, but therefore also one in working, and POWER, and in will. έν κατά δύναμιν, ήγουν ταυτοδύναμοι, Euthym.; who adds, εἰ δὲ ἐν κατὰ δύναμιν, ἐν ἄρα καὶ κατὰ την θεότητα και οὐσίαν και φύσιν. 40-42. Jesus departs to Bethany beyond Jordan, and is there believed on by many. 40.] See ch. i. 28 and note.

41.] The locality reminds them of John and his testimony. The remark seems to have a double tendency; -to relate their now confirmed persuasion, that though John did not fulfil their expectations by shewing a sign or working miracles, yet he was a true prophet, and really, as he professed, the forerunner of this Person, who in consequence must be, what John had declared Him to be, the Messiah. And (ver. 42) the result followed: -many believed on Him. "The 'Iwavvns repeated, ver. 42, belongs to the simplicity of the speech, which is reproduced literatim, and expresses the honour paid by the people to the holy man whose memory still lived among them." Meyer.

CHAP. XI., XII.] JESUS, DELIVERED TO DEATH, THE RESURRECTION, AND THE IAFE, AND THE JUDGMENT. XI. 1—44.] The raising of Lazarus. On the omission of this, the chief of our Lord's miracles, by the three other Evangelists, see Prolegg. ch. i. § v. 1. 1.] δέ, not transitional, -but expressing a contrast to the sojourn in Peræa, and thus conveying the reason why our Lord's retirement (see ch. x. 40) was broken in upon. Meyer (but not in edns. 2, 3), and Greswell, maintain that ἀπό means present residence,čk, nativity. But this distinction is wholly untenable: and all the inferences drawn from it in Mr. G.'s dissertation (vol. ii. p. 481 ff.) fall to the ground (see reff., especially last). Bethany is designated nated as 'the village of Martha and Mary, to distinguish it from that Bethany beyond Jordan, which has just been alluded to (not named, perhaps to avoid the confusion), ch. x. 40. Mary and Martha are mentioned as already well known from the current apostolic teaching (see Prolegg. to John, § ii. 11). 2.] Another reference to a fact which, as our Lord prophesied, was known wherever the gospel was preached. This reference containing, as it does, the expression τον κύριον (= our Lord), q. d. 'as we all well know,'-is a striking illustration of that prophecy. John himself relates the occurrence, ch. xii. 3, being necessary for the course of his narrative. 3.] The message (see vv. 21, 32) evidently was to request the Lord to come and heal him: and implies that the sickness was of a dangerous kind. 4.] The only right understanding of this answer, and our Lord's whole proceeding here is,-that He knew and foresaw all from the first,—as well the termination of Lazarus's sickness and his being raised again, as the part which this miracle would bear in bringing about the close of His own ministry. αῦτη ἡ ἀσθ.] "Ostendit Christus, notum sibi, quod tanquam nescienti indicabatur." Grot. οὐκ ἔστ. πρὸς θάν.] Its result as regards Lazarus will not be death (see Matt. ix. 24 ||, and notes) :- but (see ch. ii. 11; ix. 3) it has a higher purpose,—the glory of God;—the glorification, by its means, of the Son of God. And this $\delta o \xi a \sigma \theta \hat{\eta}$ —how was it accomplished? By this miracle leading to his death,—which in John's diction is so frequently implied in that word. (It need hardly be remarked, with Olsh. and Trench, that the glorifying of the Son of God in Lazarus himself is subordinately implied. Men are not mere tools, but temples, of God.)

doubtful whether these words were the answer sent back to the sisters, or were said to the disciples. In either case, they evidently carried a double meaning, as again those in ver. 11. Ver. 5 explains δν φιλεῖς. Observe ἡγάπα here; while we have δν φιλεῖς in ver. 3, where there was no possibility of misunderstanding the import: cf. note on Matt. v. 46, and Trench, New Test. Synonyms, p. 45.

He spoke the words ver. 4;—or at all events before the messenger returned.
7.] If the ov in ver. 6 referred to this verse, the connexion must have been made by καὶ μετὰ τ.: the ἔπειτα cuts off all connexion (Gal. i. 18), and throws back the our as explained above.

The question, why our Lord did not go at once on receiving the message, is not to be answered by any secondary reasons, such as the trial of the faith of those concerned, or the pressing nature of His own ministry in Peræa,-but by referring back to ver. 4,-because, for the glory of God, He would have the miracle happen as it did and no otherwise. Compare Meyer.

οὐχὶ δώδ.] See on ch. ix. 4, where the same thought is expressed. But here it is carried further,—' Î have a fixed time during which to work, appointed me by my Father; during that time I fear no danger, I walk in His light, even as the traveller in the light of this world by day: and (by inference) ye too are safe, walking in this light, which light to you is Myself, -walking with Me:-whosoever walks without this light, - without Me, -without the light of the divine purpose illumining the path of duty, stumbles,-because he has no light in him.' In him, for 'the light of the body is the eye,' and the light must be in us in order to guide us. Shut it out by blinding the eyes, and we are in darkness. So too of spiritual light.

The twelve-hour division of the day was common among the Jews by this time. being probably borrowed from Babylon (oi Ελληνες τὰ δυώδεκα μέρεα τῆς ἡμέρας παρά Βαβυλωνίων ξμαθον, Herod. ii. 109). As the day in Palestine varied in length from 14h, 12m. in summer to 9h. 48m. in winter, these hours must also have varied considerably in length at the different seasons (see Winer, Realwort. art. 'Tag'). I may remark that this verse refutes the fancy of Townson and others, also upheld by Bp. Wordsworth (who passes this verse without remark), that St. John adopts the so-called Asiatic method of reckoning time: see on ch. i. 40; iv. 6 al.

Notice δώδεκα emphatically prefixed, implying (as Bengel, - "jam multa erat hora, sed tamen adhuc erat dies") that though the conflict was far spent, there were yet more hours of daylight, and it could not yet be said $\partial \hat{n} \partial \hat{n} \partial \theta \hat{n} \hat{n} \hat{\omega} \rho a$, ch. xvii. 1. δίδυμος. The remark means, Let us also go (with our Master, implied in the καί), that we may die with Him (not, with Lazarus, as Grot.). This is in exact accord with the character of Thomas, as shewn in ch. xiv. 5; xx. 25; ever ready to take the dark view, but deeply attached to his Lord. 17.] Jesus remained two days after the receipt of the message: one day the journey would occupy: so that Lazarus must have died on the day of the messenger's being sent, and have been buried that evening, according to Jewish custom: see ver. 39, and Acts 18.] The geographical notice is given, to account for the occurrence detailed in the next verse. A stadium = $\frac{1}{8}$ of a Roman mile.

Meyer remarks, that nv does not necessarily imply that the places no longer existed when the Apostle wrote, but may arise from the word occurring in context with a history which is past. So Xen. Anab. i. 4. 9, αί δὲ κῶμαι ἐν αίς ἐσκήνουν Παρυσάτιδος ἦσαν. But seeing that John alone uses this form of designation (cf. ch. xviii. 1; xix. 41), and that he probably wrote after the destruction of Jerusalem, it is more natural (as Meyer himself confesses) to explain the past tense by his regarding Jerusalem and its neighbourhood as laid waste at the time when he published his Gospel. Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. in loc.) gives an account of the ceremonies practised during the thirty days of mourning. reading, τàs περὶ Μ. κ. Μ., would mean Martha and Mary and their friends—the women mourning with them. The expression is foreign to N. T. diction elsewhere, and might be used here for decorum, seeing that they were men who came: or as indicating that the house was one of large hospitality and acquaintance.

20. The behaviour of the two sisters is quite in accordance with their character, Luke x. 38-42: and thus we have a most interesting point of connexion be-tween two Gospels so widely various in their contents and character. Stier thinks (v. 19, edn. 2), as also Trench (Mirr. 398, edn. 2), that Mary did not hear of the approach of Jesus, and that we must not bring the characters to bear on this case (?). 21. This saying has evidently been the leading thought of the four days since their brother's death. Mary 22.] She seems repeats it, ver. 32. to express some expectation of the raising of her brother; but it is too great a thing for her to venture to mention: -- possibly she had not dared to form the thought fully, but had some vague feeling after help, such as she knew He would give. I can hardly see, as some have done, a "verbum minus dignum" (Bengel) in the form of her expression, δσα αν αιτήση τον θ . κ . τ . λ . It was said in the simplicity of her faith, which, it is true, was not yet a fully ripened faith: but it differs little from our Lord's own words, ver. 41.

The repetition of ὁ θεός after τὸν θεόν is to be noticed, as expressive of her faith in the unity of purpose and action between Jesus and God. 23.] I believe these words of our Lord to contain no allusion to the immediate restoration of Lazarus; but to be pædagogically used, to lead on to the requisite faith in her mind. I have to learn whether ἀναστήσεται in this direct absolute sense could be used of his recall into human life.

25, 26.] These words, as Stier observes, are the central point of the history; the great testimony to Himself, of which the subsequent miracle is the proof. The intention of the saying seems to have been, to awaken in Martha the faith that He could raise her brother from the dead, in its highest and proper form. This He does by announcing Himself (ἐγώ, Ι, and no other ...) as 'THE RESURREC-TION ' (q. d.—that resurrection in the last day shall be only by my Power, and therefore I can raise now as well), and more than that, THE LIFE ITSELF: so that he that believeth in me (= Lazarus, in her mind), even though he have died (ἀποθάνη, past) shall live; and he that liveth (physically, 'is not yet dead') and believeth in me, shall never die: i.e. 'faith in Me is the source of life, both here and hereafter; and those who have it, have Life, so that they shall NEVER DIE; physical death being overlooked and disregarded, in comparison with that which is really and only death. Compare 4 Macc. vii. 19. The two must be (against Lampe, Olshausen, and Stier) taken of physical life, for it stands opposed to καν ἀποθάνη. ὁ πιστ. εἰς ἐμέ is the subject of both clauses; in the former it is said that he καν ἀποθ., ζήσεται: in the second, that he ζων, οὐ μὴ ἀποθάνη. Olshausen's remark, that ζῶν and ἀποθ. in the second clause must both be physical, if one is, is wrong; the antithesis consisting, in both clauses, in the reciprocation of the two senses, physical and spiritual; and serving in the latter clause, as a key hereafter to the condition of Lazarus, when raised from the dead.

in ver. 26 to the state of the living faithful at the Lord's coming (πάντες οὐ κοιμηθησόμεθα, πάντες δὲ ἀλλαγησόμεθα, 1 Cor. xv. 51),-for although the Apostle there, speaking of believers primarily and especially, uses the first person,—the saying would be equally true of unbelievers, on whose bodies the change from τὸ φθαρτόν to ἀφθαρσία will equally pass, and of whom the οὐ μη ἀποθάνη here would be equally true,—whereas the saying is one setting forth an exclusive privilege of & ζων κ. πιστεύων είς έμέ. Besides, such an interpretation would set aside all reference to Lazarus, or to present circumstances. 27.] Her confession, though embracing the great central point of the truth in the last verse, does not enter fully into it. Nor does she (ver. 40) seem to have adequately apprehended its meaning. ὅτι μὲν μεγάλα περὶ ἐαυτοῦ εἶπεν, έγνω πως δὲ ταῦτα εἶπεν, ἡγνόησε διὰ τοῦτο ἔτερον ἐρωτηθεῖσα, ἕτερον ἀποκρίνεται, Euthym. ἐγώ, I, for my part : πεπίστευκα, 'have convinced myself, and firmly believe.' o erg. Stier thinks that the Lord had not actually asked for her, but that Martha sees such an especial fitness tor her hearing in the words of vv. 25, 26, that she uses this expression. But is it not somewhat too plainly asserted, to mean only calling by inference? Meyer regards the φωνεί σε as proving it to have been a fact.

even now in the East [see an affecting account in Lamartine's Pilgrimage to the Holy Land. English Translation, vol. ii. pp. 76-78]. 32. The words of Mary are fewer, and her action more impassioned, than those of her sister: she was perhaps interrupted by the arrival of Kühner, Gram. the Jews: cf. ver. 33. § 627, Anm. 4, remarks that when the genitive of the enclitic personal pronoun is prefixed to its substantive, a slight sense of the dativus commodi is given: "non mihi frater mortuus esset." 33.] In explaining this difficult verse, two things must be borne in mind: (1) that euβριμάσμαι can bear but one meaning, that of indignor ("infremuit," Vulg.),-the expression of indignation and rebuke, not of sorrow. This has been here acknowledged by all the expositors who have paid any attention to the usage of the word. (2) That both from is elder, &c., -from kai ἐτάραξ. ἐαυτ., and ver. 35,—the feeling in the Lord was clearly one of rising sympathy, which vented itself at last in tears.

These two things being premised, I think the meaning to be, that Jesus, with the tears of sympathy already rising and overcoming His speech, checked them, so as to be able to speak the words following. I would read ένεβρ. τ. πν., καὶ έτ. έαυ., καὶ $\epsilon l \pi \epsilon \nu$ in immediate connexion, as expressing the temporary check given to the flow of His tears,-the effort used to utter the following question. And I would thus divest the self-restraint of all stoical and unworthy character, and consider it as merely physical, requiring indeed an act of the will, and a self-troubling,-a complication of feeling,—but implying no deliberate disapproval of the rising emotion, which indeed immediately after is suffered to prevail. What minister has not, when burying the dead in the midst of a weeping family, felt the emotion and made the effort here described? And surely this was one of the things in which He was made like unto His brethren. Thus Bengel: "Ita Jesus austeriore affectu lacrymas hic cohibuit, et mox ver. 38 abrupit. Eoque major earum fuit auctoritas." Meyer's explanation deserves mention: that our Lord was indignant at seeing the Jews, His bitter enemies, mingling their hypocritical tears (Grocodilethranen) with the true ones of the bereaved sister. But, not to say how unworthy this seems of the Person and occasion, the explanation will find no place in ver. 38: for surely the question of the Jews in ver. 37 is not enough to justify it. Still perhaps any contribution to the solution of this difficult word is not to be summarily rejected. not the dat. after ἐνέβρ., 'rebuked His spirit,'—but in Spirit: see ἐν ἑαντῷ Indignation over unbelief ver. 38. and sin, and death the fruit of sin, doubtless lay in the background; but to see it in the words (with Olsh., Stier, and Trench), seems unnatural. ἐτάραξεν ἐαυτόν is understood by Meyer, and perhaps rightly, as describing an outward motion of the body,-He shuddered: and so Euthym.: διέσεισε (not, as Bloomf. somewhat confidently asserts, a blunder of the scribes for $\delta\iota\epsilon\sigma\epsilon\iota\sigma\theta\eta$, but the (so-called) intrans. sense of $\sigma \epsilon i \omega$, in which it was used of this very act of 'shaking' bodily: cf. 35-38. It is probable that the second set of Jews (ver. 37) spoke with a scoffing and hostile purport: for John seldom uses $\delta \epsilon$ as a mere copula, but generally as but: see vv. 46, 49, 51.

It is (Trench, p. 407, edn. 2) a mark of accuracy in the narrative, that these dwellers in Jerusalem should refer to a miracle so well known among themselves, rather than to the former raisings of the dead in Galilee (Strauss has made this very point an objection), of which they probably may have heard, but naturally would not thoroughly believe on rumour only. Again, of raising Lazarus none of them seem to have thought, only of This second preventing his death. ξμβριμασθαι of our Lord I would refer to the same reason as the first. ἐδάκρυσε μέν, άφεις την φύσιν ενδείξασθαι τὰ έαυτης.

There is no necessity here for supposing the entrance to have been otherwise than horizontal, as the word σπήλαιον would lead us to believe. Probably, from this circumstance, as from 'the Jews' coming to condole,-and the costly ointment (ch. xii. 3),—the family was wealthy.

39.] The corpse had not been embalmed, but merely 'wrapped in linen clothes with spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury,'—see ch. xix. 40, and ver. 44 below. ἡ ἀδελφή τοῦ τετελευτηκότος, as Meyer remarks, notes the natural horror of the sister's heart at what was about to be done. There is no reason to avoid the assumption of the plain fact (see below) stated in non ofer. I cannot see that any monstrous character (Olsh., Trench) is given to the miracle by it; any more than such a character can be predicated of restoring the withered hand. In fact, the very act of death is the beginning of decomposition. I have no hesitation, with almost all the ancient, and many of the best modern Commentators, in assuming ήδη όζει as a fact, and indeed with Stier, believing it to be spoken not as a supposition, but as a (sensible) fact. The entrances to these vaults were not built up,-merely defended, by a stone being rolled to them, from the jackals and beasts of prey. 40. I can hardly think she supposed merely that Jesus desired to look on the face of the dead; -she expected something was about to be done, but in her anxiety for decorum (Luke x. 40) she was willing to avoid the consequence of opening the cave. This feeling Jesus here rebukes, by referring her to the plain duty of simple faith, insisted on by Him before (vv. 25, 26? or in some other teaching?) as the condition of beholding the glory of God (not merely in the event about to follow,-for that was seen by many who did not believe,but in a deeper sense,-that of the unfolding of the ἀνάστασις κ. ζωή in the personal being). 41, 42. In the filial relation of the Lord Jesus to the Father, all power is given to Him: the Son can do nothing of Himself :- and during His humiliation on earth, these acts of power were done by Him, not by that glory of His own which He had laid aside, but by the mighty working of the Father in Him, and in answer to His prayer: the difference between Him and us in this respect being, that His prayer was always heard, -even (Heb. v. 7) that in Gethsemane. And this hovors nou He states here for for $\lambda \alpha (\alpha \rho \epsilon, \lambda \alpha (\alpha \rho)^{-1})$.

the benefit of the standers-by, that they might know the truth of His repeated assertions of His mission from the Father. At the same time He guards this, ver. 42, from future misconstruction, as though He had no more power than men who pray, by έγω δε ήδειν ὅτι πάντοτέ μου ἀκούεις, 'because Thou and I are One.'

When He prayed, does not appear. Probably in Peræa, before the declaration 43. Some (Chrys., Lampe) in ver. 4. suppose that the revivification had taken place before εὐχαριστῶ σοι,—and these words were merely a summoning forth. But this is highly improbable. The comparison of ch. v. 25, 28, which are analogically applicable, makes it clear that ἀκούσαντες ζήσονται is the physical as well as the spiritual order of things.

κραυγάζειν was not His wont: see Matt. xii. 19. This cry signified that greater one, which all shall hear, ch. v. 28.

It does not appear whether the bands were wound about each limb, as in the Egyptian mummies, so as merely to impede motion,—or were loosely wrapped round both feet and both hands, so as to hinder any free movement altogether. home. 45-57.] THE DEATH OF JESUS THE LIFE OF THE WORLD. Consequences of the miracle. Meeting of the Sanhedrim and final determination, on the prophetic intimation of the High Priest, to put Jesus to death. He retires to Ephraim.

46.] Meyer, with his usual philological acumen, takes pains to set right the understanding of this. In the last verse, it is not πολλοί των έλθόντων, but πολλοί ... οἱ ἐλθόντες: thus identifying the πολλοί with those that came: 'many . . to wit, those that came.' All these ἐπίστευσαν εls αὐτόν (see a similar case in ch. viii. 30 ff.). Then, τινές έξ αὐτῶν, viz. the έλθόντων, and πιστευόντων, went, &c. The $\delta\epsilon$ (see on ver. 37) certainly shews that this was done with a hostile intent: not in doubt as to the miracle, any more than in the case of the blind man, ch. ix., but with a view to stir up the rulers yet more against Him. This Evangelist is very simple, and at the same time very consistent, in his use of particles: almost throughout his Gospel the great subject, the manifestation of the Glory of Christ, is carried onward by our. whereas & as generally prefaces the development of the antagonist manifestation of hatred and rejection of Him. If it seem strange that this hostile step should be taken by πιστεύοντες είς αὐτόν, we at least find a parallel in the passage above cited, ch. viii. 30 ff. 47.] Their words may be read two ways; with, or without, a question after ποιοῦμεν. (1) is the ordinary way. (2) as in A. V. R., 'What do we, seeing that,—because,—this man doeth many miracles?'

48.] They evidently regarded the result of 'all believing on Him,' as likely to be, that He would be set up as king: which would soon bring about the ruin here mentioned. Augustine (in Joan. Tract. xlix. 26) understands it differently: that, all men being persuaded by Him to peaceful lives, they would have no one to join them in revolt against the Romans; but this seems forced: for no ἐλεύσονται would in that τὸν τόπον, not, case be provoked. the temple (sc. ayıov, Acts vi. 13. 2 Macc. v. 19 hardly applies, being the place which the Lord chose to put His Name there, not δ τόπος ήμων) but our place, as in reff.: i.e. our local habitation, and our national existence. Both these literally came to pass. Whether this fear was earnestly expressed, or only as a covert for their enmity, does not appear. The ήμων is emphatic, detecting the real cause of their anxiety. Respecting this man's pretensions, they do not pretend to decide: all they know is that if he is to go on 49—52.7 thus, THEIR status is gone. The counsel is given in subtilty, and was intended by Caiaphas in the sense of political expediency only. But it pleased God to make him, as High Priest, the special though involuntary organ of the Holy Spirit, and thus to utter by him a prophecy of the death of Christ and its effects. That this is the only sense to be given, appears from the consideration that the whole of vv. 51, 52 cannot for a moment be supposed to have been in the mind of Caiaphas; and to divide it and suppose the latter part to be the addition of the Evangelist, is quite unjustifiable. τ. ἐνιαυτοῦ ἐκείνου—repeated again, ch. xviii. 13. He was High Priest during the whole Procuratorship of Pontius Pilate, eleven years: Jos. Antt. xviii. 2. 2, and 4. In του èv. èk. there is no intima-

There certainly was a belief, arising probably originally from the use of the Urim and Thummim, that the High Priest, and indeed every priest, had some knowledge of dreams and utterance of prophecy. We find it in Jos. B. J. iii. 8. 3, and Philo de Creat. Principum, 8, vol. ii. p. 367. The latter says ὁ πρὸς ἀλήθειαν ίερεὺς εὐθύς ἐστι προφήτης. That this belief existed, may account for the expression here; which however does not confirm it in all cases, but asserts the fact that the Spirit in this case made use of him, as High Priest, for this purpose. CHAP. XII. 1—36.] PROPHETIC ANTI-CIPATIONS OF THE LORD'S GLORIFICA-TION BY DEATH. 1—11.] The anoint-ing at Bethany. Matt. xxvi. 6—13. Mark xiv. 3-9, where see notes. 1.] On πρὸ έξ ήμ., see reff. It is an expression frequent in later Greek; so μετά τριάκοντα ήμ. των γάμων, Dio lix. 20; μετὰ δέκα ἔτη τοῦ οἰκῆσαι 'Αβραὰμ ἐν γῆ Χαναάν, Philo de Congressu, 14, vol. i. p. 529. See numerous instances in Greswell, vol. iii. Diss. 1, where he defines the expression to be exclusive of the period named as the limit ad quem or a quo (according as πρό or μετά is used), but inclusive of the day or month or year of the occurrence specified. Thus the arrival, and anointing, at Bethany, will be on the eighth of Nisan, if the passover was on the fourteenth. That day was a Sabbath; but this makes no difficulty, as we know not from what point our Lord came, or whether He arrived at the commencement of the Sabbath, i. e. sunset,—or a little after, on Friday evening, from Jericho. 2. ἐποίnoav It is not said who. ό μέλλων αὐτὸν παραδιδόναι is not inserted, nor are any such notices in St. John without significance. It has a pragmatic connexion with the narrative in hand. Only one with thoughts alien from Jesus could have originated such a murmur. And on the other hand, it may well be, as some have supposed, that by the rebuke of the Lord on this occasion, the traitorous scheme of Judas, long hidden in his inmost soul, may have been stimulated to immediate action. 5. Triakor. $\delta\eta\nu$.] Common (with the slight difference of the insertion of $\epsilon \pi \omega \omega$) to our narrative and Mark. (De Wette), to keep the reeds, or tongues, of wind instruments:—thus, generally, any kind of pouch, or money-chest. See LXX, and Josephus, in reff. ἐβάσταζεν] It seems hardly possible, with St. John's use of βαστάζειν in ch. xx. 15 before us, altogether to deny that the sense of carrying off, i. e. purloining, may be here intended. And we have examples in Josephus somewhat analogous: e. g. Antt. vii. 15. 3, where Hyrcanus the High Priest, wishing to give Antiochus Eusebes money to raise the siege, καὶ ἀλλαχόθεν οὺκ εὐπορῶν, ἀνοίξας ἕνα οἶκον τῶν ἐν τῷ Δαυίδου μνήματι, καί βαστάσας τριςχίλια τάλαντα, μέρος ἔδωκεν 'Αντιόχω See also ib. ix. 4. 5; xii. 5. 4: and Polyb. i. 48. 2. And so Origen, Theophyl., al.; contra Lücke, De Wette, Tholuck, al. 7.] See note on Matt. ver. 12. To suppose that it was a remnant from that used at the burial of Lazarus, is not only fanciful, but at variance with the character of the deed as apparent in the narrative. The rec. reading, είς τ. ήμ. τ. έντ. μου τετήρηκεν αὐτό, seems to be an adaptation to Mark xiv. 8, in order to escape from the difficulty of understanding how she could keep for His burial, what she poured out now. Meyer understands the text of the remnant: but Luthardt rightly observes that the history clearly excludes the idea of a remnant: cf. $\epsilon \pi \rho \alpha \theta \eta$ and $\epsilon \delta \delta \theta \eta$. He himself, with Baumg.-Crusius, takes τηρήση as past, "Let her have kept it," i. e. blame her not for having kept it: but this is vapid in sense, and ungrammatical. I understand the words, which, like all our Lord's proleptical expressions, have something enigmatical in them, of her whole act, not regarded as a thing past, but spoken of in the abstract as to be allowed or disallowed: Let her keep it for the day of my burial: not

The chief priests, named here and in ch. xi. 57, were of the sect of the Sadducees; and therefore disbelieved the fact of the raising of Lazarus; only viewing him as one whom it would be desirable to put out of the way, as an object of popular attention in connexion with Jesus. 11.] ὑπῆγον, went away (to Bethany); there is something in the ὑπ- which almost always implies away, out from under, the persons or the place in the narrative. Notice the thrice-repeated ταῦτα, each time signifying 'this which was written by the Prophet,' 'the above citation.' 17.] The testimony which they bore is given in Luke xix. 37, 38. Meyer regards the έφώνησεν έκ τοῦ μνη-μείου κ. ἤγειρεν έκ νεκρῶν as an echo of their cong of triumph. 18.7 I see no necessity for supposing this multitude distinct from that in the last verse. We have had no account of any multitude coming from Bethany with Him, nor does this narrative imply it: and surely o oxlos in the two verses must mean the same persons. The kai here does not imply another oxlos, but And on this account the multitude also went out to meet Him: i. e. their coming out to meet Him and their μαρτυρία on the Mount of Olives, had one and the same cause,-the raising 19. κόσμος] κόσμον τὰ of Lazarus. πλήθη λέγουσιν. note; also Acts viii. 27. 21.] For what reason Philip was selected, it is impossible to say. The Greek form of his name may imply some connexion with Hellenistic Jews, who may have been friends or re-Intives of these Greeks. If they were from the neighbourhood of Bethsaida, they would indeed have been familiar with the person of Jesus :- but what they here requested was evidently a private interview.

22. Andrew (ch. i. 45) was of the same city as Philip: and this reason of Philip conferring with him is perhaps implied in the τω ἀπὸ Β. τ. Γ. Bengel remarks on this touch of nature: "cum sodali, audet." ἔρχεται—so ἔπεμψέ με 'Aριαίος κ. 'Αρτάοζος, Xen. Anab. ii. 4. 16. 23.] Did the Greeks see (i. e. speak with) Jesus, or not? Certainly not, if I understand His discourse rightly. But they may have been present at, and have understood it. The substance of His answer (autois, to Philip and Andrew, not to the Greeks) is, that the time was now come for His glorification, which should draw all nations to Him:-but that gloritication must be accomplished by His Death. The very appearance of these Greeks is to Him a token that His glorification is at hand. Stier strikingly says, "These men from the West at the end of the Life of Jesus, set forth the same as the Magi from the East at its beginning; -but they come to the Cross of the King, as those to His cradle." (R. J. v. 69, edn. 2.) The rejection of the Jews for their unbelief is the secondary subject, and is commented on by the Evangelist, vv. iva, not 'eventual,' nor 'for' 37 - 43.any thing, but most strictly of the purpose—the hour has come, that (whose object of preparation, and aim, in the eternal counsels, it has been, that) the Son of Man should be glorified. thinks, that our Lord begins His declaration with the double asseveration aunv άμήν, on account of the unreceptivity of the mind of the disciples for the announcements of His Death. But St. John always The grain of wheat uses aunv aunv. perishes, and is not apparent (as the seeds of dicotyledonous plants are) in the new plant: see 1 Cor. xv. 36. The saying is more than a mere parabolic similitude: the divine Will, which has fixed the law of the springing up of the wheat-corn, has also determined the law of the glorification of the Son of Man, and the one in analogy with the other: i. e. both through Death. The symbolism here lies at the root of that in ch. vi., where Christ is ό άρτος της ζωης. αὐτὸς μόνος, by itself alone, with its life uncommunicated, lived only within its own limits, and not passing on. 25.] And this same divine Law prevails for the disciples, as well as for their Master: see Matt. x. 39 and note. But the saying here proclaims more plainly its true extent,—by its immediate connexion with ver. 24, and by els \(\mathcal{L}\). alw.

ψυχή is not really in a double sense: as the wheat-corn retains its identity, though it die, so the ψυχή: so that the two senses are, in their depth, but

And to express both these together in human speech was impossible: therefore τί είπω; The following words must not be taken interrogatively (as by Theophyl., Grot., Tholuck, al.) [as if our Lord were doubting whether to say them or not]: for thus the whole sense is destroyed, besides the sentiment being most unworthy of Him who uttered it. The prayer is a veritable prayer; and answers to the prophetic Messianic prayers in the Psalms, which thus run-" My soul is troubled; Lord, help me" (Ps. lxix. 1; xl. 12, 13; xxv. 17; vi. 3, 4 al.); and to that prayer afterwards in Gethsemane, Matt. xxvi. 39. Stier, v. 77, edn. 2: so also Lampe. This interpretation does not, as Luthardt says, fall with the interrogative punctuation of the previous clause, but holds equally good when that is relinquished. The other interpretation, that of Meyer, al., is, that Thy Name may be glorified. But surely this is to do violence to the order of thought. This particular does not come in till the next clause, and cannot without an improbable trajection be drawn into this. 28.] The glorifying the Name of the Father can only take place by the glorification of the Son; and this latter only by His death: so that this is the "ardor obedientiæ" triumphant. φωνή] This 'voice' can no otherwise be understood, than as a plain articulate sound, miraculously spoken, heard by all, and variously interpreted. could not by any possibility have been said to them, if it had only thundered.

Our Lord does not say that the assurance was not made for His sake ;-He had prayed, and His prayer had been answered :- but that it had not been thus outwardly expressed for His, but for their sake. This is likewise true in the case of all testimonies to Him; and especially those two other voices from heaven,-at His Baptism and His Transfiguration. ύμας is the whole multitude, not merely the disciples. All heard, and all might have understood the voice: see ch. xi. 42. 31.] All this is a comment on ἐλήλυθεν ἡ ὥρα, ver. 23: and now a different side of the subject is taken up, and one having immediate reference to the occasion : viz. the drawing of the Gentile world to Him. He speaks of Himself as having actually entered the hour of His passion, and views the result as already come.

κρίσις, not (Chrys., Cyril, Aug., Grot.) "the deliverance of this world from the devil;"-nor, "decision concerning this world," who is to possess it (Bengel) :but (see ch. xvi. 11) judgment, properly so called, the work of the Spirit who was to come, on the world, which δλος έν τώ πονηρώ κείται, 1 John v. 19. ό ἄρχ. ד. κόσ. ד.] The שֵׁר הָעוֹלָם of the Jews, Satan, the δ θεδς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου of 2 Cor. iv. 4: see also Eph. ii. 2; vi. 12. Observe it is ἐκβληθήσεται, not ἐκβάλλε-ται, because the casting out (ἔξω, ἐκ τῆς άρχηs, Euthym., Grot., or better perhaps, out of δ κόσμος ουτος, his former place) shall be gradual, as the drawing in the next verse. But after the death of Christ the casting out began, and its first-fruits were, the coming in of the Gentiles into the Church. 32.] See reff. Here there is more perhaps implied in w. than in either of those places: viz. the Death, with all its consequences. The Saviour crucified, is in fact the Saviour glorified; so that the exalting to God's right hand is set forth by that uplifting on the Cross. There is a fine touch of pathos, corresponding to the feeling of ver. 27, in ἐὰν ὑψωθῶ. Hermann's description of the meaning of έαν τοῦτο γένηται exactly gives it: "sumo hoc fieri, et potest omnino fieri, sed utrum vere futurum sit necne, experientia cognoscam." Viger, p. 832. The Lord Jesus, though knowing all this, yet in the weakness of his humanity, puts himself into this seeming doubt, 'if it is so to be: cf. Matt. xxvi. 42. All this is missed by the shallow and unscholarlike rendering 'when,' which I need hardly remind my readers ἐάν can never bear. See on ch. xiv. 3: 1 John iii. 2.

Then it was, 'no man can come except the Father draw Him:' now the Son draws all. And, to Himself, as thus uplifted, thus exalted ;-the great object of What God bids the Prophet do, is here described as done, and by Himself: which is obviously implied in the Heb. text. The reading αύτῶν (Morus) supplying ὁ λαὸς οὖτος as the subject of $\tau \epsilon \tau \dot{\nu} \phi$, and $\pi \epsilon \pi \dot{\omega} \rho$., is out of the question,-as ungrammatical, and inconsistent with the context, which will only allow of δ κύρισς (i. e. There can be no reasonable doubt that this meal was the same as that at which the Lord's Supper was instituted, as related in the three Evangelists. The narrative proceeds without any break until ch. xvii. 26, after which our Lord and the disciples go to Gethsemane. 1. πρὸ τ. έορ. τ. π.] How long, is not said: but probably, a very short time; -not more than one day at the most: see ch. xviii. 28 and note. The words belong to the whole narrative following, not to είδώς or αγαπήσας. είδώς The view with which our Lord washed His disciples' feet, is shewn by the repeated είδώς and by αγαπήσας αὐτούς. The connexion is :-" Jesus loved His own even to the end (of His life in the flesh), and gave them in the washing of their feet a proof of His love; and to this act He was induced by the knowledge that He must soon leave this world; and although this knowledge was united (ver. 3) with the highest consciousness of His divine mission and speedy glorification, yet this latter did not prevent Him from giving this proof of His self-humiliating love" (De Wette).

2. δείπ yev. Not as E. V. 'supper being ended,' for (ver. 12) He reclined again, and in ver. 26, the supper is still going on:-but, supper having begun, or having been served—see Ἰησ. γενομένου ἐν Βηθ. Matt. xxvi. 6, 'When Jesus had arrived at B.; —and πρωίας γενομένης, when it had become morning, ch. xxi. 4. Cf. also γενομένου σαββάτου, Mark vi. 2.

τοῦ δ. ήδη βεβ.] The construction of the text, according to the true reading, is involved and difficult. But its meaning will be immediately perceived, if we render βεβληκότος είς την καρδίαν, suggested,proposed, viz. to the mind of Judas. The devil having by this time suggested (to Judas) that Judas Iscariot the son of Simon (i. e. that he) should betray Him. The interpretation of βεβλ. είς τ. κ., "having conceived in his (the devil's) mind" (Meyer), is wholly unworthy of a scholar, and simply absurd. Judas had before this covenanted with the Sanbedrim to betray Him, Matt. xxvi. 14 and ||, which must here be meant by the devil having put it into his heart:—the thorough selfabandonment to Satan which led to the actual deed, being designated ver. 27.

Luke (xxii. 3) expresses the steps of his treasonable purpose otherwise,-meaning the same. The fact is here stated, to enhance the love which Jesus shewed in the following action. 3.7 See above. He did what follows with a full sense of the glory and dignity of His own Person. "Præfatio gloriæ est instar protestationis, ne quid indignum fecisse existimetur Dominus pedes suorum lavans." Bengel.

Bengel. He put Himself into the ordinary dress of a servant. Or, which is far more probable, on the deepest grounds, did He not humble Himself so far as literally to divest Himself, and gird Himself merely, as the basest of slaves? 5.] τὸν νιπ., the vessel usually at hand for such purposes. The context seems to shew that He had washed the feet of one or more before the incident of the next verse: were it not so, ήρξατο might merely ex-tion for 8, which would be the ordinary case after διεζωσμένος, cf. going on, before He came to Peter. νίπτεις] art Thou washing (intending to wash) my feet? He thinks the act unworthy of the Lord; even as many think that great act of Love to have been, which was typified by it. Notice that µov is enclitic, not emphatic, in which case it would be ἐμοῦ. The having his feet washed is a matter of course: it is the Person who is about to do it that offends him.

7.] Hitherto our Lord had been silent. He emphasizes the eyú and ov, but so as to set forth Himself as the Master, Peter as the disciple, not wholly cognizant of His will and purpose, and therefore more properly found in subjection to it.

μετὰ ταῦτα] (1) was known very soon, but (2) and (3) not till after the Spirit was given. 8.] The rash and selfopinionated Apostle opposes to μετὰ ταῦτα his οὐ μη . . . εἰς τ. alῶνa. In interpreting our Lord's answer, we must remember, that He replies more to the spirit of Peter's objection, than to his words. The same well-meaning but false humility would prevent him (and does prevent many) from stooping to receive at the hands of the Lord that spiritual washing which is absolutely necessary in order to have any part in Him, Rom. viii. 9, 'If I wash thee not, thou hast no part in Me;' but the affirmative proposition is not equally true; witness the example of Judas, who was washed, but yet had no part in Jesus. In the spiritual sense of washing, this is not so. Whoever is washed by Jesus, has part in Him. We are here in the realm of another and deeper logic: the act being no longer symbolic, but veritable.

9.] The warm-hearted Peter, on learning that exclusion would be the consequence of not being washed, can hardly have enough of a cleansing so precious. There surely is implied in this answer an incipient apprehension of the meaning of our Lord's words. The ἐὰν μὴ νίψω σε has awakened in him, as the Lord's presence did, Luke v. 8, a feeling of his own want of cleansing, his entire pollution. This sense (Stier, Bengel, Baumgarten-Crusius) is denied by Lücke and Olsh. Reference appears to be made to the fact that one who has bathed, after he has reached his home, needs not entire washing, but only to have his feet washed from the dust of the way. This bathing, the bath of the new birth, but only yet in its foreshadowing, in the purifying effect of faith working by love, the Apostles, with one exception, had; and this foot-washing represented to them, besides its lesson of humility and brotherly love, their daily need of cleansing from daily pollution, even after spiritual regeneration, at the hands of their Divine Master. See 2 Cor. vii. 1: James i. 21: Acts xv. 8, 9: 2 Pet. On καθ. ἐστε. see note, ch. 11.] τὸν παραδιδόντα, as δ έρχόμενος, him that should betray Him, the indefinite characteristic present.

The custom of literally and ceremonially washing the feet in obedience to this command, is not found before the fourth century. 15.] $\kappa \alpha \theta \omega_s$, not δ , $\epsilon \gamma \dot{\omega} \epsilon \pi$. Our Lord's action was symbolical, and is best imitated in His followers by endeavouring, "if a man be overtaken in a fault, to restore (καταρτίζειν) such an one in the spirit of meekness:" Gal. vi. 1. 16, 17.] The proverbial expression οὐκ ἔστιν δ. . . . is used here in a different sense from ch. xv. 20. Here it is, 'if the Master thus humble Himself, much more should His servants and messengers:' see Matt. x. 24: Luke vi. 40; and on ver. 17, Luke xii. 47, 48. The mere recognition of such a duty of humility, is a very much more easy matter than the putting it in practice. 18.7 I say it not (viz. the έαν ποιῆτε αὐτά) of you all: for there is one who can never be μακάριος. Our Lord repeats His αλλ' ούχ l πάντες of ver. 10, and the sad recollection leads to His trouble in spirit, ver. έγω οίδα The έγω is emphatic; and the reason of its emphasis is given in ver. 19. Connexion: 'It might be supposed that this treachery has come upon Me unawares; but it is not so: I (for my part) know whom I have selected (viz. the whole twelve, see ch. vi. 70; not only the true ones (Stier), as in ch xv. 16, said when Judas was not present): but this has been done by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, declared in the Scriptures.' Bengel. 19.] 'Now, from this time, I announce it to you, that when it shall have happened, you may believe that I am (the Christ).' See ch. xvi. 1, and above on έγω οίδα, ver. 18. 20.7 See Matt. x. 40. The connexion is very difficult, and variously set down. has been generally supposed (Euthym., &c.) that the words were to comfort the Apostles for the disgrace of their order by Judas, or in prospect of their future labours. But then would not αν τινα π. have been expressed by bμas? Another view is to refer back to vv. 16, 17, and suppose the connexion to have been broken by the allusion to Judas. But is this likely, in a discourse of our Lord? rather believe that the saying sets forth the dignity of that office from which Judas was about to fall: q. d. 'not only was he in close intercourse with Me (ver. 18), but invested with an ambassadorship for Me, and in Me, for the Father; and yet he will lift up his heel against Me.' And the consideration of this dignity in all its privileges, as contrasted with the sad announcement just to be made, leads on to the ἐταράχθη τῷ πν. of the next verse.

έμαρτ. implies the delivery of some solemn and important announcement. This was the first time He had ever spoken so plainly. All four Evangelists agree in the substance of the announcement.

22.] In Matt. and Mark they express their questioning in words. St. Luke's συνζητείν προς ξαυτούς would appear to imply the same. We seem called on here to decide a much-controverted question, where in John's narrative the institution of the Lord's supper is to be inserted? I believe certainly before this announcement, as in Luke: and if before it, perhaps before the washing of the disciples' feet: for I see no break which would admit it between our ver. 1 and ver. 21. Thus the second guest to the right hand lay with his head near the breast of the first, and so on (Lücke ii. 565). δν ἡγάπα ὁ Ἰησ.] The disciple meant is John himself, see ch. xxi. 20; also designated thus, ch. xix. 26; xxi. 7 (see Prolegomena to John, § i. 6). 24-26.] See note on Matt. ver. 23. Peter characteristically imagines that John, as the beloved disciple, would know: but he, not knowing, asks of the Lord. It is an argument for the reading in the text, that (Schulz) John never uses the optative.

25.] ἀναπεσών, leaning back ούτως, on the bosom of Jesus. as in ref. I understand it, that John, who was before lying close to the bosom (ἐν τῷ κόλπω) of Jesus, now leaned his head absolutely upon His breast, to ask the

This escaped the notice of the rest at the table: see on Matt. as above. 26.] This = Matt. ver. 23, Mark, Meyer remarks, that the ver. 20. eγώ is expressed as a contrast to the τὸ ψωμ., probably a piece of the unleavened bread, dipped in the broth made of bitter herbs. 27.] "Post offulam, non cum offula." Theod. Mops., as merely betokening την κύρωσιν τῶν καταθυμίων τῷ διαβόλφ λογισμῶν. δ ποιείς....] These words are not to be evaded, as being permissive (Grot.) or dismissive (οὐδὲ προςτάττοντος οὐδὲ συμβουλεύοντος, ονειδίζοντος και δεικνύοντος ετι αυτός μεν εβούλετο διορθώσασθαι, επειδή δε αδιορθώτως είχεν, αφίησιν αυτόν. Chrys. Hom. in Joan. lxx. 1. 2). They are like the saying of God to Balaam, Num. xxii. 20,—and of our Lord to the Pharisees, Matt. xxiii. 32. The course of sinful action is presupposed, and the command to go on is but the echo of that mysterious appointment by which the sinner in the exercise of his own corrupted will becomes the instrument of the purposes of God. Thus it is not 8, or el TI, moinoeis, but 8 ποιείς: - that which thou art doing, hast just now fully determined to put in present action, do more quickly-than thou seemest willing:'--or perhaps better 'than thou wouldst otherwise have done,' which seems the account to be ordinarily given of this use of the comparative:-reproving his lingering, and his pretending (Matt. ver. 25) to share in the general doubt.

28.] Not even John: who knew he was the traitor, but had no idea the deed was so soon to be done (Lücke, De Wette). Stier supposes John to exclude himself in saying οὐδείς τ. ἀνακ., and that he knew.

29.] The first supposition agrees with ver. 1,—that it was πρὸ τῆς ἐορτῆς τοῦ πάσχα. Had it been the night of the passover, the next day being hallowed as a sabbath, nothing could have been bought. On the whole question see notes on Matt. xxvi. 17, and ch. xviii. 28. On the second supposition, see ch. xii. 5. The gift to the poor might be, to help them to procure their paschal lamb.

The remark $\hat{\eta}_{\nu}$ $\delta \hat{\epsilon}$ $\nu \hat{\nu} \hat{\xi}$ (which certainly concludes this period, see $\tilde{\sigma}_{\tau} \epsilon o \tilde{\epsilon}_{\nu}$, ver. 12) seems to be added to bring the whole narrative from ch. xiii. 1 to ch. xviii. 3 into precision, as happening on one and the same night. It is perhaps fanciful to see, as Orig., Olsh., Stier, &c. have done, an allusion to the $\sigma\kappa\sigma\tau(\hat{a})$ in Judas's soul, or to $\tilde{\nu}\mu\tilde{\omega}\nu$... $\tilde{\eta}$ $\tilde{\omega}\rho\alpha$ $\kappa\alpha$ $\tilde{\eta}$ $\tilde{\tau}$ $\tilde{\xi}\epsilon$ ovoía $\tau\alpha\hat{v}$ $\sigma\kappa\dot{\tau}$ - $\tau\nu$, Luke xxii. 53; though doubtless there the Lord alludes to its being also night: but I quite feel, with Meyer, that there is something awful in this termination—it was night.

31-38. Announcement of the factits effect on Peter. Here commences that solemn and weighty portion of the Gospel (ch. xiii. 31-xvii. 26) which Olshausen not without reason calls Allerheiligstes-'the most holy place.' He beautifully remarks, "These were the last moments which the Lord spent in the midst of His own before His passion, and words full of heavenly meaning flowed during them from His holy lips :- all that His heart, glowing with love, had yet to say to His own, was compressed into this short space of time. At first the conversation with the disciples takes more the form of usual dialogue: reclining at the table, they mournfully reply to and question Him. But when (ch. xiv. 31) they had risen from the supper, the discourse of Christ took a higher form: surrounding their Master, the disciples listened to the Words of Life, and seldom spoke (only ch. xvi. 17, 29). Finally, in the sublime prayer of the great High Priest, the whole Soul of Christ flowed forth in earnest intercession for His own to His

Heavenly Father." Olsh. ii. 329. 31. νῦν ἐδοξ.] It was not that the presence of Judas, as some have thought, hindered the great consummation imported by ¿δοξ., but that the work on which he was gone out, was the ACTUAL COMMENCEMENT of that consummation: "ab hinc enim passiones Christi initium capiebant." Lampe. It is true that his presence hindered the expression of these gracious words: "jam quasi obice rupto torrentes gratiæ a labiis Jesu effunduntur." Id. έδοξάσθηspoken proleptically as if accomplished, because the deed was actually in doing, which was to accomplish it. The glorifying spoken of here, and in δοξάσει, ver. 32, is not the same. This is the glorifying of God by Christ on earth, in His course of obedience as the Son of Man, which was completed by His death (ὑπήκοος μέχρι θανάτου, Phil. ii. 8). And His death was the transition-point between God being glorified in Him, and He being glorified in God-manifested to be the Son of God with power by His resurrection, and received up to the Father, to sit at the right nand of God. This latter (ver. 32) is spoken of by Him here as future, but immediate (εὐθύς) on His death, and leads on to the address in ver. 33. έν έαυτῷ is in God (the Father), not in Christ. έαυτ. reflects back on the subject of the sentence: and $\vec{\epsilon}\nu$ is not 'by means of,' but in, by the resurrection of Him into that glory, which He had indeed before, but now has as the Son of Man, with the risen Manhood; so παρὰ σεαυτῷ, ch. xvii. 5. Grotius compares 1 Sam. ii. 30 (τοὺς δυξάζοντάς με δοξάσω LXX). ἀντι-δωρείται αὐτῷ ὁ πατὴρ τὸ μείζον οὖ δ vids τοῦ ἀμθρώπου πεποίηκεν. Origen.

Bengel. But naturally the two clauses, 'Ye shall seek Me and not find Me, and shall die in your sins,' also spoken to the Jews (ch. vii. 33; viii. 21), are here omitted: and by this omission the connexion with ver. 34 is supplied;-'Ye shall be left here: but, unlike the Jews, ye shall seek Me and shall find Me. and the way is that of Love,-to Me, and to one another (so Stier, v. 140 ff. edn. 2) -forming (ver. 35) an united Body, the Church, in which all shall recognize My presence among you as My disciples.'

34. The καινότης of this commandment consists in its simplicity and (so to speak) unicity. The same kind of love was prescribed in the O. T. (see Rom. xiii. 8):-'as thyself' is the highest measure of love, and it is therefore not in degree that the new commandment differs (Cyr., Euthym., Theod. Mops.) from the old, nor in extent, but in being the commandment of the new covenant,-the first-fruit of the Spirit in the new dispensation (Gal. v. 22): see

1 John ii. 7, 8 (and note), where καινή is commented on by the Apostle himself.

I cannot agree with Stier (v. 148, edn. 2), that ἴνα in the second sentence is not || with ἵνα in the first, but signifies ('I have loved you') "in order that &c." The sentence is analysense to ver 14 and the new point in it. logous to ver. 14, and the new point in it is the καθώς ήγ. ύμ., which is therefore

36.] This announcement of Peter's denial is probably the same with that in Luke xxii. 33 ff., where see notes: but distinct from that on the way to Gethsemane, Matt. xxvi. 34: Mark xiv. 30. ἀκ. δὲ ὕστ., alluding probably both to the future reception of His Apostle into His glory, and to the particular path by which he should come to that glory;—as in ch. xxi. 18, 19.

37.] Peter understands our Lord's death to be meant [as the time of his following]: see Luke, ver. 33.

38. The δια τί is not answered—but Peter's boast solemnly questioned. See a somewhat similar question, ch. i. 51. There was at the same time a startling inversion of the subsequent facts, in this boast; to which our Lord, I think, alludes in His question, -τ. ψ. σου ὑπὲρ The οὐ μὴ ἀλέκ. φων. έμου θήσεις: necessarily implies, as it was night, ev th νυκτί ταύτη [Matt., Mark],-and binds the whole events of this chapter to CHAP. XIV. 1-31. This first division of the great discourse (see above on ch. xiii. 31) is spent in more directly comforting the disciples for their Lord's departure, by the assurance of His going to the Father, and its consequences. 1-10. HE, in his union with the Father, will take His own to Him.

1.] A pause has intervened; "Peter is humbled and silent" (Lücke); the rest are ταρασσόμενοι τῆ καρδία on account of the sad things of which they had been hearing;—Judas's treachery,—Peter's denial,—the Lord's departure from them.

κιστεύετε both times is imperative. So Cyr., Nonn., Thl., Euth., Aug., Hil.,— Lampe, Lücke, De Wette, Stier, Tholuck (edn. 6), and A. V. R. Many (Erasmus, Beza, Grot., Olsh., also E. V.) take the first as indic., the second as imper., 'Ye believe in God: believe also in me.' But this is inconsistent with the whole tenour of the discourse, which presupposes a want of belief in God in its full and true sense, as begetting trust in Him. Luther takes both as indicative. The command is intimately connected with ch. xiii. 31, 32faith in the glorification of Christ in the Father, and of the Father in Him.

2.] This comfort—of being reunited to their Lord-is administered to them as τεκνία, in forms of speech simple, and adapted to their powers of apprehension of spiritual things. The olkia is Heaven: Ps. xxxiii. 13, 14: Isa. lxiii. 15. In it are many (in number-not in degree of dignity, as Clem. Alex., Basil., Theod., Chrys., Theophylact, Tert., Hil., Aug., &c., at least no such meaning is here conveyed) abiding-places; room enough for them all; - ίκαναl δέξασθαι καl ύμας συνεσομένους ήμιν ἀεί. Euthym. If not,—if they could not follow Him thither, He would not have concealed this from them. This latter assurance is one calculated to beget entire trust and confidence; He would not in any matter hold out vain hopes to them ;-His word to them would plainly state all difficulties and discouragements, -as indeed He does, ch. xv. 18; xvi. 1, 4; which last verse Ίνα μνημ. ὅτι ἐγω εἰπον ὑμῖν, is decisive for the above interpretation here, against those who would join ὅτι πορεύομαι with εἶπον ἃν ὑμῖν (Euthym., Aug., Erasm., Luther, Bengel): -which besides does violence to the next verse, where the 'going to prepare a place' is stated as a fact. The our may, it is true, have been inserted as a ὅτι recitantis, to favour the view just controverted: but it is much more probably genuine, signifying because, and belongs to the whole sense of vv. 1, 2, as a reason why their heart should not be troubled.

The sense confidently proposed for the many mansions by a correspondent, that He was going to one part of His Father's house, while they would remain in another, that house being not Heaven, but the Universe, -is entirely put out of the question, as being frigid in the extreme under the solemn circumstances,-as being contrary to all Scripture analogy of expression,-and as inconsistent with the πορεύομαι έτοιμάσαι τόπον υμίν, where the τόπος is of necessity correlative with the μοναί, which are in that οἰκία whither He is going. Besides, their earthly μικρός xpovos could in no sense be called a μονή. The έτοιμάσαι τόπον is that of which we sing,-" When Thou hadst overcome the sharpness of death, Thou didst open the Kingdom of Heaven to all believers:" see note on Luke xxii. 43. And thus it is τόπον, not τàs μονάς:--the thus it is whole, not each man's place in it.

3.] On ἐάν (not 'vohen,' here or any where), see note, ch. xii. 32. Here there is no translation of feeling: only in the extract from Hermann there, we may

In order to understand this, we must bear in mind what Stier well calls the 'perspective' of prophecy. The coming again of the Lord is not one single act,as His resurrection, or the descent of the Spirit, or His second personal advent, or the final coming to judgment; but the great complex of all these, the result of which shall be, His taking His people to Himself to be where He is. This epapal is begun (ver. 18) in His Resurrection carried on (ver. 23) in the spiritual life (see also ch. xvi. 22 ff.), the making them ready for the place prepared; -further advanced when each by death is fetched

He is THE WAY; not merely the Forerunner; which would imply on our part only an outward connexion with Him as His followers: - but the way, in and on which we must go, having an inner union with and in Him (De Wette) : see Heb. x. ή αλήθεια—more than ὅτι ἀληθεύω κ. πάντως έσται ταῦτα, Euth. It is another side of the same idea of the Way; -God being true, and only approached by and in truth. Christ IS THE TRUTH, in Whom only (Col. ii. 3) that Knowledge of Him is gained, which (ch. xvii. 3) is eternal ή ζωή-not merely because οὐδὲ δ θάνατος διαστήσει διιας έμου, Euthym.,but as being THE LIFE (see ver. 19: Gal. ii. 20) of all His, in Whom only they who live can come to the living Father (ch. vi. 57). $\hat{\text{oùdels}} \in \text{px}$...] This plainly states the $\pi \hat{\text{oùdels}} \notin \pi \hat{\text{dya}}$, and the way also.

δι' ἐμοῦ—as τῆς ὁδοῦ. 7.] See ch. viii. 19. ἀπ' ἄρτι] There is no difficuity, if we bear in mind the vov of ch. xiii. 31. The henceforth is the future time, beginning with our Lord's glorification, which was now at hand. Lücke remarks: "ἀπ' ἄρτι is not entirely future nor entirely present, but the moment of transition, the identification of the present and future. Christ speaks here proleptically, in reference to the hour of His glorification being come" (ii. 598).

πορεύομαι (Grot., Griesb., Lachm., Knapp, Lücke, Meyer, Stier place a comma only and connect this verse with the oru), because the sense remains much the same, and the style is better preserved. αἰτήσητε, scil. τον πατέρα: so ch. xv. 16; xvi. 23. But this does not exclude, but distinctly includes, prayer to Christ; so blended are these two (as the opav, ver. 9), that we have not ποιήσει, but ποιήσω, and, ver. 14, emphatically έγω ποιήσω. He who prays to the Father, prays to the This ποιήσω answers to the ποιήσει in ver. 12; the reason why you shall do these greater works, is, on account of the all powerful Spirit of grace and supplication which My going to the Father shall bring down upon the Church; in answer to which Spirit, I will do by you whatever in My Name (i. e. in union with Me, as being Mine, manifesting forth Jesus as the Son of God) ye shall ask. And the end of this is, that by these peiζονα τούτων, the wonders of grace and triumphs of the Spirit, the Father may be glorified (His glory shewn forth) in and Ver. 14 solemnly repeats by the Son. as a promise, what was incidentally asserted before: "For this is a truth, that whatever' &c. And besides, adds the ἐγώ: it is I that will do it: shewing that the use of the first person before was emphatic. " ἐγώ hoc jam indicat gloriam."-Bengel.

Ver. 15 is a following out of the $\dot{\epsilon}\nu$ τῷ ὀνόματί μου: 'That way of prayer is the way of loving obedience, in which the Spirit is ever found, and which is only trodden by His help:'-and also of Iva δυξ. ὁ π. ἐν τῷ νί., 'As the Father is honoured in the Son, so must the Son be honoured in you: see ch. xv. 10.

16. And then the Spirit shall proceed forth upon you. Not αἰτήσω, but ἐρωτήσω - "familiaris petendi modus," Bengel :- rather perhaps, a manner of asking implying actual presence and nearness,and here used of the mediatorial office in Christ's ascended state. TOV Olshausen remarks that the interpretations of this word range themselves in two classes, which again by no means exclude one another :- those of 'Com-FORTER,' and those of 'ADVOCATE.' (" Teacher" (Theodore of Mopsuest, and Ernesti) is out of the question.) etymology of the word requires the latter as its strict meaning, and in this strict meaning it satisfies 1 John ii. 1, παράκλητον έχομεν πρός του πατέρα Ίησοῦν χριστόν: but not so all the places where it is used of the Holy Spirit, -nor this verse, where of the Son and Spirit both. And therefore the other meaning, -Comforter, including as it does in its fulness (see Rom. viii. 26, where both, the συναντιλαμβάνεσθαι and the ὑπερεντυγχάνειν, are united) the Advocate also, has been both here and in Germany (Trôfter, Luther) sanctioned by Christian usage as the most adequate rendering. See Archdeacon Hare's Mission of the Comforter, vol. ii. note J a. He shews that Wicliff, from whom we have our Comforter, often used "comfort" for the Latin comfortari, as e. g. Luke xxii. 43: Acts ix. 19 al. Thus the idea of help and strength is conveyed by it, as well as of consolation.

It was this office (comfortari) which Jesus

Euthym. understands παρ' όμ. μένει of the Spirit abiding in Jesus, Who was among them: but wrongly.

ἐστίν] This was perhaps corrected to the future, because, though their knowledge of the Spirit proper to their complete state, and His dwelling, remaining, among them, had in some inferior sense begun,-His dwelling in them had not. See Hare, Mission of the Comforter, ii. note I. With the reading ¿στίν, the prolepsis is still 18.] ὀρφ. should be orphans, as in the E. V. marg. The office of the παράκλ. is to connect the disciples with the Father: if therefore they had Him not, they would be fatherless. The expression connects with τεκνία ch. xiii. 33, and as Euthym., springs from πατρική εὐσπλαγχνία. This makes ἔρχομαι, I am coming, plain, as applying to the coming by the Spirit, who is one with Christ ;not only the ultimate personal coming, which is but the last step of the έρχομαι, nor only the bodily coming again to them and not to the world at the Resurrection. which was but a pledge of His lasting presence in the Spirit: see on ver. 3. έρχομαι is (as there) the complex of these the great Revisitation, in all its blessed progress. The absence of any connecting particle as $\gamma d\rho$, with $\epsilon \rho \chi o \mu a \iota$, arises (Meyer) from the depth of affection in the Lord's heart. 19—21.] This ξρχομαι is explained to consist in His presence among them by the life of His Resurrection, which is theirs; by (ver. 20) the witness of the Spirit in their hearts; and (ver. 21) their sanctification by the Spirit in love, and the consequent manifestation of Jesus to them,

Luthardt (ii. p. 309 f.) attempts to confine ἔρχομαι (and this whole passage) to the παρουσία, in spite of the plain sense of vv. 19, 20, relying on the analogy of Rev. xxii. 17, and saying that on the common interpretation, the Church would have no cause to long for her Lord: and so Aug., Maldon., Hofm., al. But manifestly the context is against him: and he must thus explain away many other passages (e. g. Matt. xviii. 20). The presence of Christ by the Spirit is none the less real, for being incomplete. 19.7 The immediate reference of this θεωρείτε is to the forty days (see Acts x. 41)-but only as leading on to its wider and deeper

25.] λελάληκα is proleptic, referring, as εἶπον (ver. 26), to the futures, διδάξει and ὑπομνήσει. Meyer supposes that a pause took place here, and the Lord looks back on what He had said to them. But this does not seem so natural.

26.] q. d. 'I know that ye do not understand them yet: but' &c. τὸ πν. τὸ ἄγ.] The Paraclete is now more closely defined by this well-known Name, -and, by δ πέμψει δ πατήρ, and εκείνος ..., designated personally, as One sent, and One acting on them. έν τω όν. μου, not, 'in My stead,' but in regard of Me-'in answer to My prayer, and prayers in My name,—to those who bear My name,—and as a means of manifesting Me.' διδάξ. πάντα stands by itself, not with & εlπον:-shall teach you all things ;- 'all that can and may be learnt by you, all that belongs to your work and life in Me.' ὑπομνήσει] What is not understood is liable to be forgotten;—and therefore in this word is implied the giving them a right understanding of, as well as recalling, what Jesus had said to them: see ch. ii. 22; xii. 16. on the fulfilment of this promise to the Apostles, that their sufficiency as Witnesses of all that the Lord did and taught, and consequently THE AUTHEN-TICITY OF THE GOSPEL NARRATIVE, is 27.7 This is introduced grounded. by ver. 25, which suggests the speedy close of the discourse. It was customary to take leave with wishes of peace :- so I Sam. i. 17: Luke vii. 50: Acts xvi. 36: 1 Pet. v. 14: 3 John 15. Also, to reassure by such words, see Gen. xliii. 23: Judg. vi. 23. But our Lord distinguishes His peace, true peace, 'the peace which I have and give' (see ch. xv. 11), from the mere empty word used in the world's form of greeting. Peace (in general) He leaves with them ;- His peace He gives to them, over and above that other. The καθώς ὁ κ. δίδ. must refer, I think (with Lampe, Lücke, and Stier), to the world's manner of giving,—not to the unreality of the world's peace, of which, however true, there is no direct mention here. The world can only give peace in empty formulæ, saying 'Peace, peace,' when there is no peace: Jer. vi. 14. al.

Ver. 28 as far as buas is a reason why their heart should not be troubled; then the rest of the verse removes all ground of δειλία, since it is an exaltation of Him whom they loved, which is about to happen; and therefore a ground of joy, fore the going of Jesus to the Father is an advancement. This word greater, as Luther well remarks (Stier, v. 228, edu. 2), is not here used as referring to the Nature or Essence of the Son as related to the Father,-but as indicating that particular subordination to the Father in which the Lord Jesus then was,-and the cessation of the state of humiliation, and entering into His glory, which would take place on His being received up to the Father. So also Calvin: "Non confert hic Christus Patris Divinitatem cum sua, nec humanam suam naturam divinæ Patris essentiæ comparat, sed potius statum præsentem cœlesti gloriæ ad quam mox reci-piendus erat." And Cocceius: "Non intelligitur hic minoritas secundum naturam humanam, - quia intelligitur minoritas quæ per profectionem ad Patrem deponitur" (Stier, ibid. Similarly, De Wette, Tholuck). And this removes all reason for fear, as they will be exalted in Him.

The whole doctrinal controversy which has been raised on these words (especially by the Fathers against the Arians, see Suicer, Thes. ii. pp. 1368-9), seems not to belong to the sense of the passage. That there is a sense in which the Father is greater than even the glorified Son, is beyond doubt (see especially 1 Cor. xv. 27 f.); but as on the one hand that concession is no concession to Arianism, because it is not in the essential being of the Son, but in His Mediatorial office that this minoritas consists, -so on the other hand this verse implies in itself no such minoritas, the discourse being of another kind. 29.] είρηκαviz. Aug. ibid. 2. This is the only true interpretation: has nothing in Me-no point of appliance whereou to fasten his attack. But Meyer well observes, that this is rather the fact to be assumed as the ground of what is here said, than the thing itself which is said. De Wette, Lücke, Tholuck, and many others render it, " has no power over me," — οὐδὲν αἴτιον 31.] 'But my θανάτου, Euthym. The construction is elliptic: supply, 'But (his power over Me for death will be permitted by Me) that,' &c. And set a period at ποιῶ, as usually done.

Meyer, al., and Luthardt, would carry on the sense from moio, "But that the world may know that I love the Father, and as the Father commanded me, thus I do, arise, let us go hence." I need only put it to the inner feeling of any who have learned to appreciate the majesty and calmness of our Lord's discourses, whether a sentence so savouring of theatrical effect is likely to have been spoken by Him. We may notwithstanding safely believe that the ex.

Probably the rest of the discourse, and the prayer, ch. xvii., were delivered when now all were standing ready to depart. There would be some little pause, in which the preparations for departure would be made. But the place is clearly the same, see ch. xviii. 1, ταῦτα $\epsilon i\pi \omega \nu$ δ 'Ιησοῦς $\epsilon \xi \hat{\eta} \lambda \theta \epsilon \nu$:—besides which, we can hardly suppose (Grot., &c.) discourses of a character like those in ch. xv. xvi. to have been delivered to as many as cleven persons, while walking by the way, and in a time of such publicity as that of the Paschal Feast. Still less is the sup-position of Bengel and Beausobre probable,—that ch. xiii. xiv. happened outside the city, and that between ch. xiv. and xv. the paschal meal takes place. Compare also ch. xiii. 30, which is decisive against this idea.

CHAP. XV. 1—27.] Injunction to vital union in love with Jesus and one another.

1-11. Their relation to Him. Various suggestive circumstances have been imagined, but none of them are satisfactory. The vineyards on the way to Gethsemane (Lampe),-the carved vine on the great doors of the temple (Rosenmüller, Bibl. Exeget. Repert. i. 166 (Lücke),—see Jos. B. J. v. 5. 4: Antt. xv. 11. 3); a vine trained about the window of the guest-chamber (Knapp, Lücke conj., Tholuck, 6), are all fanciful, and the two first (see on ch. xiv. 31) inapplicable. The cup, so lately partaken (Meyer, Stier), is certainly nearer,—see below. But I believe with Lücke that most probably the Lord did not take the similitude from any outward suggesting occasion, but as a means of illustrating the great subject, the inner unity of Himself and His. enough was furnished, by the O. T. symbolism of the vineyard and the vine,-Isa. v. 1 ff.: Jer. ii. 21: Ezek. xix. 10 ff., and especially Ps. lxxx. 8-19: by the intimate analogy of vegetable life (of which the tree bearing fruit is the highest kind, and of such trees the vine the noblest) with spiritual, and perhaps also by the $\gamma^{\ell\nu}\nu\eta\mu\alpha$ $\tau\hat{\eta}s$ $\hat{\alpha}\mu\pi$. having been so recently the subject of their attention and the Lord's prophecy, Luke xxii. 18||.

1.] The Vine and branches stand in a much nearer connexion than the Shepherd and the sheep, or the lord of the vineyard and the vines; and answer to the Head and members in Eph. v. 23, 30: Col. ii. 19, linked together by a common organization, and informed by one and the same life. ἡ ἀληθινή, not only, 'by which prophecy is fulfilled:' not only, "in which the organism and qualities of the vine are most nobly realized" (Tholuck), but as in ch. i. 9, true, i. e. original, archetypal. The material creations of God are only inferior examples of that finer spiritual life and organism in which the creature is raised up to partake of the divine nature; only αντίτυπο των αληθινών, Heb. ix. 24; ύποδείγματα των έν τοις ούρ., ib. 23: see ch. vi. 32. ὁ γεωργός, not only the tiller of the land, but the vine-planter and dresser; He who has originated the relation between the vine and branches by planting the Vine in this earth (the nature of man), and who looks for and ensures the bringing forth of fruit. The Vine contains fruitful, and unfruitful branches. Who are these unfruitful branches? Who are the branches? Clearly, all those who, adopting the parallel image, are made members of Christ by baptism, Rom. vi. 3, 4: compare σύμφυτοι, ib. ver. 5, also Rom. xi. 17 ff. The Vine is the visible Church here, of which Christ is the inclusive Head: the Vine contains the branches; hence the unfruitful, as well as the fruitful, are ev emoi. Every such unfruitful branch (notice the μή in an hypothesis, not οὐ) the Father αἴρει,—pu.ls off and casts away: and every one that beareth fruit He καθαίρει (an allusion to aloe, but only in the Greek (?):

In Eph. v. 26, we have both the washing διὰ τὸν λόγον, and the word (ἐν ῥήματι), united. The word of Christ dwelling in them by Faith (see ver. 7) is the purifying principle (ch. xvii. 17). But the καθαροί here is not = κεκαθαρμένοι, pruned, in the sense of ver. 2. The ἤδη limits it to their present capacities and standing. There was more pruning at hand, when the sap should begin to flow, - when the Spirit should be shed abroad; and this future handling of the γεωργός is indicated by μείνατε έν ϵ μοί 4.] κἀγὼ ϵ ν δ μ. must not (with Euthym., Meyer, and Lücke) be taken as a promise, which (see on èv èuoi above) would be contrary to the sense: but (with Aug., Tholuck, Bengel, Stier, who however modifies it by rendering "so abide in Me that I may abide in you") as a clause dependent on μείνατε εν εμοί, 'Take care that ye abide in Me and I in you:' both these being necessary to the bringing forth fruit: see ver. 5, where the two are similarly bound together.

Here the natural strictness of the similitude is departed from. The branch cannot sever itself from the vine: but, such a case supposed, every one will see the inevitable consequence. Bengel says well, "Hic locus egregie declarat discrimen naturæ et gratiæ." It is the permitted freewill of the creature which makes the difference between the branches in the two 5.] The interpretation of the allegory which each mind was forming for itself, the Lord solemnly asserts for them. Notice οὖτος—he and no other: 'it is he, that $\chi \omega \rho i s \epsilon \mu$. is more than 'without Me,' it $= \chi \omega \rho i \sigma \theta \epsilon \nu \tau \epsilon s a \pi$ ' εμοῦ (Mey.), separate from Me, from being in Me and I in you. The ort regards what is implied in χωρίς έμ. οὐ δ. π. οὐδ. rather than the word themselves : because union with Me (μένειν ἐν ἐμοί) is the sole efficient cause of fruit being produced, you having no power to do any thing (not, ποιείν καρπόν: for φέρειν is here used throughout), to bring any thing to perfection, to do any of the aperal of that which ye are, separate from Me. This verse is a most important testimony against supra-lapsarian error, shewing us that falling from grace is possible, and pointing out the steps of the fall. Observe this is not said of the unfruitful branch. which the Father takes away (in judgment): but of one who will not abide in Christ, becomes separate from Him: (1) is cast out (of the vineyard, or of the Vine) like a (τὸ κλημα, scil. τὸ ἄχρηστον, Euth.) branch in such a case: (2) becomes dried up, having lost the supply of lifegiving sap ("quenched the Spirit," 1 Thess. b μείνητε εν εμοί και τὰ ρήματά μου εν υμίν c μείνη, δ εάν b ch. ziv. 10 θ μείνητε εν εμοί και τὰ ρηματα μου εν υμιν μεινη, θ εαν reff. θ ελητε αιτήσασ θ ε, καὶ γενήσεται ὑμίν. θ εν θ τούτ ϕ or θ τούτ ϕ or θ γενήσεται ὑμίν. θ εν θ θ γενει θ γε ° ἐδοξάσθη ὁ πατήρ μου, α΄ ίνα ° καρπὸν πολὺν ° φέρητε, εκαὶ γένησθε ἐμοὶ μαθηταί. The sense is best served by placing a colon (as in E. V.) after buas ηγάπησα, making μείνατε κ.τ.λ. a separate injunction, and καγώ = ουτως. With only a comma at ηγάπησα, that which is the great assertion of the sentence, is suffered to slip by unnoticed; viz. that 'as the Father hath loved the Son, so the Son His disciples.' τη ἀγ. τη ἐμη may be rendered the love of Me, as in Luke xxii. 19 | 1 Cor.,—but the sense is not good, and the expression is not parallel with $\tau \hat{\eta}$ $\dot{\alpha} \gamma$. $\mu o \nu$ in ver. 10; so that I prefer my love, the love which I have towards you; remain in it: do not cast yourselves out of it. The other sense is implied in this, but not expressed.

10. The way thus to remain is prescribed; even that way of simple obedience to His Will, which He followed to the Will of the Father. On τη ἀγάπη μου, see above: in the last clause, autou is prefixed, as Meyer well says, to denote the high consciousness of bliss and dignity in abiding in the Father's love.

12-17.] Union in love with one another enjoined on them. 12.] That He may shew them that it is no rigid code of keeping commandments in the legal sense, ver. 11 is inserted, and now the commandment (as including all others) is again explained (see ch. xiii. 34) to be, mutual love,-and that, after His example of Love to them. 13. A difficulty has been unnecessarily found in this verse, because St. Paul, Rom. v. 6 ff., cites it as a nobler instance of love, that Christ died for us when we were enemies. But manifestly here the example is from common life, in which if a man did lay down his life it would naturally be for his friends; and would be, and is cited as, the greatest example of love. Nor again is there any doctrinal difficulty: our Lord does not assert of himself, that He laid down his life only for his friends (as defined in the next verse), but puts forward this side of his Love as a great and a practical example for his followers. His own great Sacrifice of Himself lies in the background of this verse; but only in the background, and with but one side of it seen, viz. his Love to them. See 1 Tim. iv. 10, and compare 1 John iii. 16. as in ver. 8, depends on αύτη, not on any will implied in ἀγάπη (De Wette), nor used erbatikûs (Olsh.),—and answers to 'scilicet, ut:' see on this use of Iva, note on 1 Cor. xiv. 13. Ver. 14 parallel to ver. 10,—and, like it, guarded, in vv. 15, 16, 17, from legal misinterpretation.

Ver. 15 proleptically spoken, of the state in which He would place them under the Spirit. Nor is there any discrepancy with ch. xiii. 13, 16, and ver. 20 here, which are also spoken of their future condition: for in that sense both relations subsist together. It is the lower sense of δοῦλος which is brought out in this verse. The proleptical character of the saying is clearly shewn in the οὐκ οἶδεν τί ποιεῖ ό κ., for this was precisely their present condition, but was after His Ascension changed into light and knowledge.

έγνώρισα ύμ.] Here again the allusion must be (see ch. xvi. 12) to their future state under the dispensation of the Spirit: nay, even to the fulness and completion of it, as Aug. remarks, Tract. lxxxvi. 1, vol. iii. pt. ii.: compare the confession of one of the greatest Apostles, 1 Cor. xiii. 10. Euth., Chrys., Thl. explain it ἐφύτευσα, in the parabolic sense. But the parable seems to be no further returned to than in the allusion implied in καρπός. 'Ordained,' in E. V., is objectionable, as conveying a wrong idea. ὑπάγ. κ. καρ. φέρ.] ύπ. probably merely expresses (see ref. and Matt. xviii. 15; xix. 21, and πορευόμενοι, Luke viii. 14) the activity of living and developing principle; not the missionary journeys of the Apostles (Grot., Lampe, Meyer). The $\kappa \alpha \rho \pi \delta s$ is not the Church, to be founded by the Apostles, and endure ;-this is evident, for here the fruit is spoken of with reference to themselves, and their ripening into the full stature of Christ. Much of their fruit will be necessarily the winning of others to Christ: but that is not the prominent idea here. μένη] See 2 John 8: Rev. xiv. 13. ἴνα ὅ τι ἀν . . .] This ἵνα ϳs parallel with the former one, not the result of it; the two, the bringing forth of fruit and the obtaining answer to prayer, being co-ordinate with each other; but (vv. 7, 8) the bearing fruit to God's glory is of these the greater, being the result and aim of the other. ταύτα refers (as almost always in John, see vv. 11, 21; xvi. 1, 25, 33; xvii. 1; xviii. 1 al.) back to what has gone before. 'The object of my enjoining these things on you is (for all since ver. 12 has been an expansion of kattus ny. iu.) that ye love one another' (see I John iv. 11). Then from the indefiniteness of this word αλλήλους our Lord takes occasion to forewarn them that however wide their love to one another, they cannot bring all within this category; there will be à κόσμος, which will hate them.

The great proof of this hatred to Him was yet to come, but is viewed as past. This knowledge brings comfort, 1 Pet. iv. 12, Ver. 19 not only explains this hatred, but derives additional comfort from it, as a sign that they were not (any longer) of the world; but chosen out of it by Him, and endued with a new life from In το ίδιον εφίλει, not buas $\epsilon \phi$., we have the true practice of the world hinted at, and the false character of the world's love, as a mere φιλαυτία, set forth. this world fall into hating one another.

Meyer remarks the solemnity of κόσμος thus repeated five times. 20] Ch. xiii. 16, but with a different reference: the sense here being, 'Remember the saying, for it is true in this matter also:' see Matt. x. 24, where it is used in the same sense. The subject of ¿δίωξαν is δ κόσωσε as a noun of number. difficulty has been raised on ετήρησαν ... τηρήσουσιν, and some have wanted to give this word a hostile sense, (as παρατηpelv,) quoting Matt. xxvii. 36, and Gen. iii. 15 (which is altogether an exceptional use, the reading being undoubtedly genuine): see also Jer. xx. 13. But in John this cannot be. Nor is irony (Lampe, Stier) in this latter clause at all in keeping with the solemnity of the discourse. The words simply mean (as Thl.), 'the keeping My word and the keeping yours are intimately joined, and when you find the world or any part of the world do the first, you may infer the other.' The issue of εἰ τ. λ. μ. ἐτήρ. was to be proved by their rejection and killing of the Lord Jesus. Beware of rendering as Kuinoel, "If they had kept my word, they would keep yours," which is ungrammatical. The only idiomatic rendering in English is that of the E.V., If they have kept [or rather, If they kept] my word they will keep yours. 21.] ἀλλά -nay, so far is this from being so, that it is on this very account, because ye belong to Me, that they will thus treat you.

but as Acts ii. 22, ἐν μέσφ ὑμῶν. ἐποίησεν is, not only by external evidence, but also by internal, the right reading, πεποίημεν (as Lücke remarks, ii. 643) would imply that the ἄλλοι referred to were contemporaries of our Lord,-or, at all events, that their works still lasted.

έωράκασιν does not refer to the works (as Lücke), but to καl ἐμὲ καl τον πατέρα μου, see ch. xiv. 9. άλλ',-but all this not as an accidental thwarting of My word and work among them, but as a matter predicted in Scripiva, with the fullest sense of · purpose, as always, and most especially in this formula. Beware of the evasive ecbatic sense. ἐν τῷ νόμῳ αὐτῶν] See ch. x. 34 and note. Το suppose any · batic sense. irony in these words, as De W. does ("they are true followers-out of their law"), is manifestly against the whole spirit of our Lord's reference to the law. It is 'their law,'-" quem assidue terunt et jactant," Bengel,—as condemning them, though their boast and pride.

δωρεάν, not, "to no purpose," as Bengel (vergeblid), but as E. V., without a cause, answering to πρόφασιν οὐκ ἔχουσιν, ver. 22. The citation is probably from the Messianic Psalm lxix. 26.] This assurance carries on the testimony concerning Christ,-which the world should see and hear, and yet reject and hate Him,-even to the end of time, by means of the Spirit of Truth : so that on the one hand this seeing and hating must not be expected to cease as long as the Spirit bears this witness, - and on the other, He, the Spirit of Truth, will never cease to overcome the hating world by this His testimony. ό παράκλ.] See ch. xiv. 16 and note. πέμψω] Stier (whose comment on this verse should be consulted) dwells on the accurate division of the clauses here, & παράκλ. δν έγω πέμψω,—but το πνευμα τ. άληθ. ο παρά τ. πατρός έκπορεύεται. The first clause he regards as spoken œconomically, of the Spirit in His office as Paraclete, sent from the Father by the glorified Son (or, by the Father in the Son's name, ch. xiv. 26), and bringing in the dispensation of the Spirit; -the second ontologically, of the essential nature of the Spirit Himself, that He proceeded forth from the Father. (And if from the Father, from the Son also, -see ch. xvi. 15, and those passages where the Spirit is said to be His Spirit, Rom. viii. 9: Gal. iv. 6: Phil. i. 19: 1 Pet. i. 11: also Rev. xxii. 1.) Perhaps however it is better to take the whole economically, as Luthardt has done. Then δυ έγω πέμψω παρά τ. π. is parallel with δ παρά τοῦ π. ἐκπορεύεται, and the procession from the Father is the sending by the Son. At all events, this passage, as Beza remarks, cannot be alleged either one way or the other in the controversy with the Greek Church on the procession of the Holy Spirit. See this done in the interest of the Greek view, by Theodor. Mops. in loc. ekeivos, as opposed to the world which hates Christ. On the emphatic use of this pronoun as identifying the chief subject of the sentence, see note, ch. vii. 29. 27.] The disciples are not, as some have supposed, here mentioned as witnesses separate from and working with the Holy Spirit. The witness is one and the same-the Spirit will witness in and by them; the ὅταν ἔλθη δ παρ. belongs to the whole: see Luke xxiv. 48, 49, where this is strongly expressed. This verse alludes to the historical witness which the Holy Ghost in the ministers and eye-witnesses of the word, Luke i. 2, should enable them to give, -which forms the human side (kal ύμ. δέ; " quin et vos," Erasm.) of this great testimony of the Spirit of truth, and of WHICH OUR INSPIRED GOSPELS ARE THE SUMMARY: the divine side being, His own indwelling testimony in the life and heart of every believer in all time. But both the one and the other are given by the self-same Spirit; -neither of them inconsistent with, or superseding the other.

MYSELF:'-that it was I MYSELF who told you. A difficulty has been found in the latter part of the verse, because our Lord had repeatedly announced to them future persecutions, and that at least as plainly as here, Matt. v. 10; x. 16, 21-28 al. freq. And hence, De Wette, Meyer, and Lücke, and even Olsh., find ground for supposing that the chronological order of the discourses has not been followed in the Synoptic Gospels. But there is in reality no inconsistency, and therefore no need for such a supposition. This declaration, as here meant, was not made before, because He was with them. Then clearly it is now made, in reference to His immediate departure. And if so, to what will ταῦτα most naturally refer? To that full and complete account of the world's motives, and their own office, and their comfort under it, which He has been giving them. This He had never before done so plainly, though occasional mention has been made even of the help of the Spirit under such trials, see Matt. x. 19, 20. ημ. While the Lord was with them (cf. Matt. ix. 15), the malice of the world was mainly directed against Him,-and they were overlooked: see ch. xviii. 8. ημην we have the proleptical character of the discourse again manifest. This is occasioned by the foregoing, but in fact begins the new subject, the condition of the Comforter's coming. Kai ov8.] They had (see ch. xiii. 36; xiv. 5) asked this verbally before: our Lord therefore cites the question here in some other and deeper sense than they had used it there. I believe the meaning to be: 'None of you enquires into the NATURE (που being emphatic) of My departure, so as to appear anxious to know what advantages are to be derived from it; but (ver. 6) you are all given up to grief on account of what I have said, "expavescitis, neque reputatis quo discedam aut in quem finem." 6. ή λύπη πεπλ. ύμ. τ. κ.] 'Your grief (or abstract, 'grief') has filled, entirely occupied, your heart (not τàs κ., but singular, as common to all, see Rom. i. 21), to the exclusion of any regard of my object in leaving you.' "These are the same disciples who afterwards when their risen Lord had ascended to heaven,without any pang at parting with Him, returned with great joy to Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 52" (Stier). "Subest huic blandæ increpationi tacita consolatio. Dum enim improbat, quod quæstionem, quo vaderet, negligant, sibi id optime perspectum esse docet. Dum negligentiæ incusat, ad excusationem tamen affert, quod ea ex tam vehementi affectu tristitize oriunda sit." 7.] àllá refers to the last clause (notwithstanding, or nevertheless, as E. V.): ἐγώ, to οὐδείς ἐξ ὑμ. κ.τ.λ. Ι Myself tell you the real state of the case. συμφέρει ύμ. implies that the dispensation of the Spirit is a more blessed manifestation of God than was even the bodily presence of the risen Saviour. Every rendering of this verse ought to keep the distinction between ${\rm d}\pi\epsilon {\rm d}\theta\omega$ and πορευθώ, which is not sufficiently done in E. V. by 'go away' and 'depart.' Depart and go would be better: the first expressing merely the leaving them, the second, the going up to the Father. before $\partial \pi \in \partial \theta \omega$ is again emphatic: 'that I, for my part, should leave you.' This I, for my part, should leave you.' οὐκ ἐλεύσεται . . . is a convincing proof. if one more were needed, that the gift of the Spirit at and since the day of Pentecost, was and is something TOTALLY DISTINCT from any thing before that time: a new and loftier dispensation. 8-11.7 We have here, in a few deep and wonderful words, the work of the Spirit on the world set forth. This work He shall begin ἐλθών, scil. πρὸς ὑμᾶς: not, however, merely 'by your means,' but personally: so that it is not the work and witness of the Apostles which is spoken of, except in so far as they are servants of the Holy Spirit, but (¿κείνος) His own immediate personal working. έλέγξει] It is difficult to give in one word the deep meaning: 'convince' approaches perhaps the nearest to it, but does not express the double sense of ἐλέγχειν, which is manifestly here intended-of a convincing unto salvation, and a convicting unto condemnation :- "reprove" is far too weak, conveying merely the idea of an objective rebuke, whereas ἐλέγξει reaches into the heart, and works subjectively in both the abovementioned ways. See the whole question amply discussed in Archdeacon Hare's Mission of the Comforter, vol. ii. note K.

Lücke's comment is valuable: "The testimony of the Holy Ghost in behalf of Christ as opposed to the unbelieving world (ch. xv. 26) is essentially a refutation, έλεγχος, a demonstration of its wrong and error. All the apostolic preaching, as addressed to the world, takes necessarily this polemical form (1 Tim. v. 20: 2 Tim. iv. 2; iii. 16: Titus i. 9, 13; ii. 15). And the more difficult was the disciples' conflict against the power of this world with only the Word for their weapon, the more comfort was it for them, that the power of God the Spirit working by this ἔλεγχος was their help. In Matt. x. 19, 20: Luke xii. 11, 12, the apologetic side of their conflict, which was in close connexion with the polemical, is brought into view. In ἐλέγχειν is always implied the refutation, the overcoming of an error, a wrong,— by the truth and the right. And when, by means of the ἔλεγχος, the truth detects the error, and the right the wrong, so that a man becomes conscious of them,-then arises the feeling of guilt, which is ever painful. Thus every $\tilde{\epsilon} \lambda \epsilon \gamma \chi o s$ is a chastening, a punishment. And hence this office has been called the Strafamt (punitive office) of the Spirit. The effect of the $\tilde{\epsilon} \lambda \iota \gamma \chi o s$ of the Divine Spirit in the world may be to harden: but its aim is the deliverance of the world. δ κόσμος, in John, includes those who are not yet delivered (from the power of Satan to God), who may be yet delivered, -not the condemned. If the exerxes of the world is a moral process, its result may just as well be conversion, as non-conversion. Only thus did the exerxos of the Spirit answer the end of Christ's coming; -only thus could it be a cheering support to the Apostles. Certainly, the kplous with which the έλεγχος closes is condemnation, not however of the world, but of the Prince of the world" (ii. 649 f.). De Wette denies the salutary side of this ἐλέγχειν -but he is certainly wrong: see below.

These three words, ἀμαρτία, δικαιοσύνη, κρίσις, comprehend the three great steps of advance in spiritual truth among men. Of itself the world does not know what Sin is, what Righteourness is, what Judgment is. Nor can either of these be revealed to any man except by the Spirit of God working within him. Each man's conscience has some glimmering of light on each of these; some consciousness of guilt, some sense of right, some power of judgment of what is transitory and worthless: but all these are unreal and unpractical, till the ἔλεγχοs of the Spirit has wrought in him (see Stier, v. 306, edn. 2).

9.7 And the great opening of Sin to the world is to shew them that its root and essence is, unbelief in Christ as the Son of God. Unbelief: -- for, mankind being alien from God by nature, the first step towards their recovery must be to lay hold on that only safety which He has provided for them; and that laying hold is faith, and the not doing it, when revealed and placed before them, is sin. Beforetime, it was also unbelief;—"The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God:"—but now, -for we can only believe as God has revealed Himself,—it is unbelief in Christ the Son of God,—the οὐ θέλετε ἔρχεσθαι πρός με: see this pointedly asserted 1 John v. 10—12. Remember, this unbelief is not a mere want of historical faith,-but unbelief in its very root,-the want of a personal and living recognition of Jesus as the Lord (1 Cor. xii. 3), which, wherever the Spirit has "opened His commission" by the planting of the visible ểμέ· 10 περὶ δικαιοσυνης δέ, ὅτι πρὸς τὸν πατέρα [μου] $^{\rm m}$ ὑπίιγω καὶ οὐκ ἔτι θεωρεῖτέ με· 11 περὶ δὲ κρίσεως, ὅτι $^{\rm m \, ce. \, 5.}$ $^{\rm o}$ $^{\rm n}$ ἄρχων τοῦ $^{\rm n}$ κόσμου τούτου κέκριται. 12 ἔτι πολλὰ $^{\rm n \, ch. \, ziii. \, 31}$

Church, is the condemning sin of the world. Of this He shall convince those who are brought out of the world, and ultimately convict those who remain in it and die in their sins (see Hare, Mission of the Comforter, vol. ii. note Q).

10.] δικαιοσ. cannot be only the righteousness of Christ, the mere conviction of which would only bring condemnation to that world which rejected and crucified Him: but, as Stier remarks rightly (v. 312, edn. 2), τοῦ κόσμου must be supplied after each of the three άμαρτία, δικαιοσύνη, κρίσις: - the conviction being of a sin that is theirs, a righteousness that is (or, in the case of condemnation, might have been) theirs, a judgment which is theirs (see below). Then, what is the world's righteousness? Not their own, but that of the accepted Man Christ Jesus standing at the right hand of God (seen by us no more, but by that very withdrawal testified to be the Son of God, THE RIGHTEOUS ONE), manifested in the hearts of men by the Spirit to be their only righteousness; -and thereby that rightcousness, which they had of their own before, is demonstrated to be worthless and as filthy rags. It is the ὑπάγειν πρὸς τον πατέρα by which this righteousness is assured to us, and by the effect of which, the Spirit, the conviction respecting it is wrought in our hearts (see Hare, as above, note T). The condemnatory side of this part of the έλεγχος is, -that remorse, wherewith they whose day of grace is past shall look on the perfect righteousness which might have been theirs, and on the miserable substitute with which they contented themselves. 11.] Δε δικαιοσύνη was the world's righteousness, and the έλεγχος of it was the manifesting to them how worthless it (their δικαιοσύνη after its old conception) was of their own by nature, but how perfect and complete it (the same as now newly and more worthily apprehended) is in and by Christ, -so now kplois is the world's judgment :- on the one side, their judgment or estimate, or discrimination of things,—on the other side, God's judgment, to which it is opposed. This their judgment by nature they form in subjection to the prince of this world, the Devil, of whose power they are not conscious, and whose existence they even deny: but the Spirit of God ελέγξει, shall convict this judgment of wrong; -shall shew them how erroneous and destructive it is, and what a bondage they have been under;—shall detect to them the Prince of this world reigning in the children of disobedience, and give them a better judgment, by which they shall "not be ignorant of his devices" (2 Cor. ii. 11). But this better judgment itself is that very truth of God manifested in the Lord Jesus, by which (ch. xii. 31) the Prince of this world is cast out : - by which the follower of Christ is enabled to say, "Get thee behind me, Satan;" by which the unbelieving world, and its Prince, are finally condemned in the judgment hereafter (see Hare, as above, note V). I have preferred giving pointedly what I believe to be the sense of this most important passage, to stringing together a multitude of opinious on it: seeing that of even the best Commentators no two bring out exactly the same shade of meaning, and thus classification is next to impossible. I sincerely recommend the student to read the notes in Archdeacon Hare's work, where he will find the whole literature of the subject, with the exception of Stier's second edition, and Luthardt's commentary, which have been published since. It will be seen that in my view the subjective and objective bearing of the three words are both to be kept in sight, and that the great convictive work of the Spirit is to bring man OUT OF HIMSELF INTO CHRIST, Who (in His objective manifestation) must be made unto him (subjectively), (1) ἀπολύτρωσις, (2) δικαιοσύνη, (3) σοφία (the fourth, άγιασμός, not being here treated of, as being another part of the Spirit's work, and on those who are no longer the κόσμος, see ch. xvii. 16, 17); and to condemn those who remain in the world finally, in all these points, as having rejected Christ. And this convictive work of the Spirit is a complex and progressive work; including the ministry of the Apostles, and every step taken towards divine truth in the history of the Church, as well as the conversion of individuals, and condemnation of the unbelieving. 12.] The πολλά are the things belonging to πᾶσα ἡ ἀλήθεια in the next verse, which were gradually

This the Spirit should lead them into, open the way to it, and unfold it by degrees. mise of universal knowledge, nor of infallibility, is hereby conveyed; but a promise to them and us, that the Holy Spirit shall teach and lead us, not as children, under the tutors and governors of legal and imperfect knowledge, but as sons (Gal. iv. 6), making known to us the whole truth of God. This was in an especial manner fulfilled to them, as set to be the founders and teachers of the οὐ γὰρ λαλ. ἀφ' ἐαυτ.] Churches. The Spirit does not, any more than the Son, work or speak of Himself: both are sent, the one from the Father, the other from the Father and Son: the one to testify ὅσα ἀκούσει of the Father, the other of the Father and the Son. ooa ak., from God, the Father and the

Son. τὰ ἐρχ. ἀναγ. ὑμ.] As the direct fulfilment to the Apostles of the leading into the whole truth was the unfolding before them those truths which they have delivered down to us in their

Epistles,-so, though scattered traces of the fulfilment of this part of the promise are found in the Acts and those Epistles, its complete fulfilment was the giving of the Apocalypse, in which τὰ ἐρχόμενα are distinctly the subject of the Spirit's revelation, and with which His direct testimony closes: see Rev. i. 1; xxii. 6, 20. On the whole of this verse, see Eph. iv. 7-16.

14. Notice the emphatic ¿µé, prefixed to the verb. This is in connexion with ver. 12-and sets forth that the Spirit guiding into truth is in fact the Son declaring the truth, for He shall shew forth the glory of Christ, by revealing the matters of Christ,-the riches of the Father's love in Him (ver. 15). " (Economia trium testium: patrem glorificat filius, filium Spiritus sanctus." Bengel.

This verse is decisive against all additions and pretended revelations subsequent to and besides Christ; it being the work of the Spirit to testify to and declare THE THINGS OF CHRIST; not any thing new and beyond Him. And this declaration is coincident with inward advance in the likeness and image of Christ (2 Cor. iii. 17, 18), not with a mere external develop-15. Here we have given us a glimpse into the essential relations of the Blessed Trinity. The Father hath given the Son to have life and all things in Himself (Col. i. 19; ii. 2, 3), the relation being, that the Son glorifies not Himself but the Father, by revealing the Father, whom He alone knows (Matt. xi. Frag. VV. 15. 16.

And this Revelation, the Revelation of the Father by Christ-is carried on by the blessed Spirit in the hearts of the disciples of Christ; Who takes (λαμβάνει, indefinite, of the office of the Spirit) of the things of Christ, and declares, proclaims, to them. Sià τοῦτο] For this cause I (rightly) said i. e. 'this was the ground of My asserting :'-not the reason why it was said, but the justification of it when said. This verse contains the plainest proof by inference of the orthodox doctrine of the Holy Trinity.

16-24. The Lord speaks of His withdrawal, and its immediate mournful, but ultimate (and those soon to begin) joyful consequences for His disciples. connexion is: "Very soon will the Spirit, the Comforter, come to you: for I go to the Father, without any real cessation of the communion between you and Me." 16. The mode of expression is (purposely) enigmatical;—the θεωρείτε and ὅψεσθε not being co-ordinate;—the first referring merely to physical, the second also to spiritual sight. So before, ch. xiv. 19, where see note. ὄψεσθε began to be fulfilled at the Resurrection; -then received its main fulfilment at the day of Pentecost; -and shall have its final completion at the great return of the Lord hereafter. Remember again, that in all these prophecies we have a perspective of continually unfolding fulfilments presented to us: see note on ch. xiv. 3. 17, 18.] The disciples are perplexed by this μικρόν, as connected with what our Lord had before asserted ver. 10, ύπάγω πρός τ. πατέρα. That seemed to them a long and hopeless withdrawal: how was it then to be reconciled with what he now said of a short absence? What was this μικρόν? This connexion not being observed has led to the insertion of ὅτι ἐγω ὑπάγω πρ. τ. πατ. in ver. 16.

21.] The 'tertium comparationis' is ἡ λύπη εἰς χαρὰν γενήσεται: but the comparison itself goes far beyond this mere similitude. ἡ γυνή is not merely generic, but allusive to the frequent use and notoriety of the comparison. We often have it in the O. T.,—see Isa. xx. 3; xxvi. 17, 18; xxxvii. 3; lxvi. 7, 8: Hosea xiii. 13, 14: Micah iv. 9, 10.

τίκτη] is bringing forth, viz. παιδίον, expressed in τὸ π. below. ἡ ὥρα αὐτ.] her (appointed) time. τὸ παιδ. not necessarily masculine ("non puella sed

puer," Aug.), but indefinite. The deeper reference of the comparison has been well described by Olshausen: "Here arises the question, how are we to understand this similitude? We might perhaps think that the suffering Manhood of Christ was the woman in her pangs, and the same Christ glorified in the Resurrection, the Man born; but the Redeemer (ver. 22) applies the pangs to the disciples: how then will the ἄνθρωπος who is born apply to them?" Then, after condemning the shallow and unsatisfactory method of avoiding deep research by asserting that the details of parables are not to be interpreted, he proceeds: "Hence the proper import of the figure seems to be, that the Death of Jesus Christ was as it were an anguish of birth belonging to all Humanity (ein fd)merz= voller Geburtsact der ganzen Menschheit) in which the perfect Man was born into the world; and in this very birth of the new man lies the spring of eternal joy, never to be lost, for all, inasmuch as through Him and His power the renovation of the whole is rendered possible" (ii. 379). And indeed the same is true of every Christian who is planted in the likeness of Christ. His passing from sorrow to joy—till "Christ be formed in him," is this birth of pain. And the whole Church, the Spouse of Christ, nay, even the whole Creation, συνωδίνει, till the number of the elect be accomplished, and the eternal joy brought in. And thus the meaning which Luthardt insists on as against the above remarks of Olshausen, viz. the new birth of the Church, is in inner truth the same as his. 22.7 of opac — in the same manifold

Stier well remarks, "The connexion of the latter part of this verse is,—The way to οὐδὲν ἐρωτᾶν any more, is to ask and to pray the more diligently, till that day comes." It has been supposed wrongly that eµe and τον πατέρα are in opposition in this verse, and thence gathered (Origen de Orat. § 15, vol. i. p. 222, λέγεται (al. λείπεται) τοίνυν προςεύχεσθαι μόνφ τῷ θεῷ τῷ τῶν ὅλων πατρί ἀλλὰ μὴ χωρὶς τοῦ ἀρχιερέως, κ.τ.λ.) that it is not lawful to address prayer to Christ. But such an opposition is contrary to the whole spirit of these discourses, and asking the Father in Christ's name, is in fact asking HIM.

In the latter clause, notice the right reading: He shall give it you in my name, He being, as Luthardt expresses it, the element, the region, of all communication between God and the Church. Cf.

This is true of the whole discourse—and of the discourses of the Lord in general, as they must then have seemed to them, before the Holy Spirit furnished the key to their meaning.

Olshausen finely remarks, that all human language is a παροιμία, only able to hint at, not to express fully, the things of God; and that the Lord contrasts the use of this weak and insufficient medium, with the inward teaching of the Holy Spirit. This inward teaching, because it is a real imparting of the divine Nature and Life, brings with it not only prayer in the name of Jesus, but a free access to the Father

The approaching the Father through Him shall be a characteristic of their higher state under the dispensation of the Spirit. οὐ λέγω ὑμ.] This has been variously understood. Grotius's rendering, "prætereo hoc quasi minus eo quod jam inferam," comes I believe the nearest to the truth, though it does not express the whole meaning. The Lord is now describing the fulness of their state of communion with Himself and the Father by the Spirit. He is setting in the strongest light their reconciliation and access to the Father. He therefore says, Ye shall ask the Father in My name: and I do not now say to you, -I do not now state it in this form,that I will ask the Father for you-as if there were no relation of love and mercy between the Father and yourselves:—(27) for the Father Himself (αὐτός, i.e. αὐτοκέλευτος (Nonnus)— 'proprio motu')

Lord in its ideal perfection (as it will hereafter be): and is only approximated to on loveth you; -why? Because ye love and believe on Me. The whole mind of the Father towards mankind is Love: both in Redemption itself (ch. iii. 16), -and then in an especial manner by drawing those who come to Christ (vi. 44), -and again by this fuller manifestation of His love to those who believe on and love Christ. The aim of this saying is to shew them that His intercession (which is still going on under the dispensation of the Spirit, 1 John ii. 1) does not imply their exclusion from access to the Father, but rather ensures that access, by the especial love which the Father bears to them who believe in and love His Son: CHRIST being still the efficient cause of the Father's love to them, and the channel of that Love. stress must be laid (Lücke) on πεφιλήκατε here coming before πεπιστεύκατε, as to Faith coming after Love: probably $\pi \epsilon \phi \iota \lambda$. is placed first as corresponding to φιλεί just before:—and it might be said with just as much reason that καl πεπιστεύκατε... contains the ground of the πεφιλ., as the 28. But by vûv they probably only mean, in ver. 26—28. 30.7 'Thou hast spoken so clearly of our feeling towards Thee, and of Thyself, that we have no occasion to ask Thee any thing; -and this was what Thou didst announce would be ;-we know therefore, by its being so, that Thou knowest the secrets of our hearts (πάντα by inference),-and hence believe that Thou camest forth from God:' the whole being a misunderstanding of what had gone before, vv. 23, 25. 31.] Our Lord does not clear up their misunderstanding, but leaves that for the coming day of the Spirit. He only assures them that their belief, though sincere and loving, was not so deeply grounded in knowledge of Him and His appointed course as they imagined.

арть тьот. is not a question: this very belief was by our Lord recognized and commended, see ch. xvii. 8, also Matt. xvi. 17, 18. And as Stier remarks (v. 369, edn. 2), "it was the aim and purpose of the whole prophetic office of Jesus, to prepare some first disciples (not the Apostles alone) for the reception of the Spirit of Truth and the fruits of His Death, by grounding in them firm belief in His Person." CHAP. XVII. 1-26. HIS LOVE IN THE GLORIFICATION OF THE SON OF God. The parting prayer of the Lord Jesus: and herein, for Himself (1-5): for His disciples (6-19): for all believers, that they may be one (20, 21),that they may be glorified in the completion of that unity (22-24),-for their abiding in the union of love, the perfection of divine knowledge (25, 26). St. John very seldom depicts the gestures or looks of our Lord, as here. But this was an occasion of which the impression was indelible, and the upward look could not be είς τὸν ούρ.] Nothing passed over. hereby is determined as to the locality. The guest-chamber no doubt was the place of this prayer. The eyes may be lifted to heaven in as well as out of doors; heaven is not the sky, but that upper region, above our own being and thoughts, where we all agree in believing God to be especially present; and which we indicate when we direct our eyes or our hands upward. The Lord, being in all such things like as we are, lifted up His eyes to heaven when addressing the Father (not His hands, for He prays not here as a suppliant—but as an intercessor and a High Priest, standing between earth and heaven, see ver. 24, 96ho va....).

καὶ εἶπεν It is impossible to regard the following prayer otherwise than as the very words of our Lord Himself,faithfully rendered by the beloved Apostle in the power of the Holy Spirit. The view which has led so many of the best German Commentators (even Olshausen) to see in parts of it the words of the Evangelist, and not of our Lord, is, it seems to me, inconsistent with any earnest reception of the Gospels as truthful. If such a promise as ch. xiv. 26 was made, and fulfilled, then these must be the words of the Lord Himself; -and the Greek form of them only (and query whether even that? see Prolegg. ch. ii. § ii. (π)) can be regarded as bearing evidence of the style and manner of John. ner of John. πάτερ, not, Our Father,—which He never could say,—nor, My Father,—which would be too great a separation between Himself and His for such a prayer (see Matt. xxvi. "Sic patrem absolute appellat in hac oratione dulci et prolixa quater, et cum epitheto bis, in universum nonnisi sexies, idque fere ineunte nova sermonis parte, vv. 1, 5, 11, 21, 24, 25. creature could stand before his Creator and say, 'Glorify Thou me, that I may glorify Thee?'" (Stier.) This glorifying of the Father by the Son is, the whole great result of the glorification of the Son by the Father,—the manifestation of God to and in men by the Son through the Spirit.

in men by the Son through the Spirit.

2. "The causal connexion expressed by καθώς is this, that the glorification, the end, must correspond to the beginning, to the sending, the preparation, and office of the Son." (Lücke.) We must also bear in mind that the 'giving of power' in this verse is the ground, as well as the type, of the glorification, see Rom. i. 28: 1 Cor. i. 6: so Stier (v. 383, edn. 2). σάρξ is not only 'all mankind,' but (see Gen. vii. 15, 16, 21) all that has life, all that is subject to death, all that is cursed on account of sin. But of this all, mankind is the head and crown, and in the full blessings of the Lordship of Christ mankind only can participate. σάρξ is given by the Father from before the foundation of the world to Christ; the whole creation is His to rule, His to judge, by virtue of His being, in the root of that human nature, to which sovereignty over the world was given, THE SECOND AND RIGHTEOUS ADAM.

But in this wide gift, there is a more special $gift, -\delta$ $\delta \epsilon \delta \omega \kappa \alpha s$ $\alpha \delta \tau \widetilde{\phi}$ in the stricter sense,—the chosen, they who believe on Him. And to them, and then only, He imparts the further and ineffable gift consequent on union with Him their God in the Spirit,—viz. ETERNAL LIFE (compare ch. v. 26, 27; also vi. 37).

3.] See a similar definition of a term just used, in ch. iii. 19. $\delta \epsilon_i$, as there, is transitional; bringing out, in fact, the contrast between the incidental mention of the word, and its more solemn definition.

¿στιν—is; not is the way to. The knowledge spoken of is no mere head or heart knowledge,—the mere information of the mind, or excitation of the feelings,—but that living reality of knowledge and personal realization,—that oneness in will with God, and partaking of His nature, which is itself life eternal:—the knowledge, love, enjoyment, of Him who is infinite, being themselves infinite. ἡ ὕπαρξις της ζωης έκ της του θεού περιγίνεται μετοχής μετοχή δὲ θεοῦ ἐστι τὸ γινώσκειν θεδν και ἀπολαύειν τῆς χρηστότητος αὐτοῦ. Iren. adv. Hær. iv. 20. 5, p. 254. accusatives after γινώσκ. are purely accusatives of the person, and the emphasis is on γινώσκ. From not seeing this, various mistakes have arisen-e.g. the making τον μόν. αλ. θεόν the predicate, 'Thee to be the only true God,' and similarly with χριστόν (which would require τὸν χρ.) or with δν ἀπέστειλας, - Jesus, whom Thou hast sent, to be (the) Christ,'-or 'Jesus Christ to be Him whom Thou hast sent.' It is rightly rendered in E. V.

The Latin Fathers (Aug., Amb., Hil.), anxious to avoid the inference unwarrantably drawn by some from this verse against the Godhead of Christ, construed: Ίνα γ ιν. σ ε κ. Ἰ. χ . δν $\dot{\alpha}\pi$., τ δν μ δνον $\dot{\alpha}$ λ. $\theta \epsilon \delta \nu$,—which is of course inadmissible. Others (Chrys., Euth.), construing rightly, yet regarded Jesus Christ as included in the words $\mu \delta \nu$. $\dot{\alpha} \lambda \eta \theta$. $\theta \epsilon \delta \nu$. But all such violences to the text are unnecessary. For, first, the very juxtaposition of Jesus Christ here with the Father, and the knowledge of both being defined to be eternal life, is a proof by implication of the Godhead of the former. The knowledge of God and a creature could not be eternal life, and the juxtaposition of the two would be inconceivable. Secondly, the ον ἀπέστειλας most distinctly expresses the εξελθείν from God, ver. 8implies the hueis ev of ver. 22, and cannot, in connexion with what follows, possibly be understood in a Socinian, or an Arian sense. 4.] The past tenses are proleptical. In the rendering of this whole chapter they should be kept indefinite, not made into perfects as in E. V., which destroys this proleptical character. I glorified Theo . . . I finished .. What view of the agrist has led to Bp. Wordsworth's explanation here, -"the aorist is used, not the perfect, masmuch as the work of glorification was still going on, and not to be completed before His Passion, when He would say τετέλεσται,"-I am quite unable to imagine. That the agrist implies present continuance, is at least a startling doctrine. The force of it here surely is, that our Lord stands by anticipation at the end of His accomplished course, and looks back on it all as past, as historically gathered up in one act: which is the very sense and propriety of the aorist. τὸ ἔργον is not only the ministerial life of our Lord, but the whole Life, with all its appointed manifestations of humility and purity,-the perfect righteousness which by that life He has planted in our nature,—and His prophetic and declarative office, terminated by His Passion and Death. 5. δόξασόν με] Notice the correlation, which Meyer has pointed out, between $\dot{\epsilon}\gamma\dot{\omega}$ or hefore and $\mu\epsilon$ out now. 7. οὖς δέδ.] The Father gave them to Christ, by leading them to Christ, see ch. vi. 37, 44, 45. σοὶ ἦσαν] Thine (σοί, from σός) they were—Israelites—Thy people, before:—not only outwardly, but Israelites indeed, see ch. i. 48, and thus prepared to receive Christ (so Stier, v. 411 ff., edn. 2). And thus the ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου answers to λαβεῖν ἐαντῷ ἔθνος ἐκ μέσου ἔθνους, Deut. iv. 34. But see the fuller sense below, on ver. 9.

observed Thy word—walked in the path
τηρεῦν means: see ch. xiv. 23—and rest.

Stier understands their walking in the O. T. ordinances blameless, as Luke i. 6,-and thus (compare ch. i. 42, 46) recognizing Christ as the Messiah when He came. But this is perhaps hardly likely to have been set at the end of the sentence, after $\dot{\epsilon}\mu$ ol αὐτοὺς δέδωκας. It is more likely that τὸν λόγον σου = τὰ ρήματα & δέδωκάς μοι, ver. 8, and is proleptically spoken. 7.] πάντα ὅσα δέδ. μοι, 'My whole words and works:' cioiv, as contemplated in their separate meanings and testimonies: q.d. 'are all from Thee:'-the collective assertion see at ver. 10. On this their conviction, which however had not reached its ripeness yet, see ch. xvi. 30. 8.] Notice particularly here, as indeed throughout, the marked difference between the agrists and the perfects. τὰ ἡ. . . δέδ. αὐτοῖς, and the similar sayings ch. xv. 15 al., seem to be a reference to Deut. xviii. 18, 19, where it is said that the Prophet "shall speak unto them all that I shall command Him." The imparting to them of these βήματα was the efficient cause of their faith:—see their confession cl. vi. 68, 69, where πεπιστεύκαμεν and ἐγνώκαμεν are connected as here.

On the two last clauses we may notice that παρά σου έξηλθον is more a matter of conviction from inference (see ch. iii. 2), - εγνωσαν: - whereas the other side of the same truth, σύ με ἀπέστειλας, the act of the Father unseen by us, is more a matter of pure faith, - ἐπίστευσαν. In the first, the Eyvwoav alybos stamps our Lord's approval on their knowledge, and distinguishes it from such knowledge as the bare οἴδαμεν [ch. iii. 2] of Nicodemus and his colleagues. 9.7 Stier remarks, that the Lord here begins to fulfil His promise Matt. x. 32. περί τ. κόσμου έρ. The misconceptions which have been made of this verse (Calvin, Lampe, and even Luther, who elsewhere corrects himself, see Tholuck on John, edn. 6, p. 352) as implying a decree of exclusion for the vessels of wrath, may be at once removed by considering the usage of ο κόσμος in this Prayer. The Lord does pray distinctly for δ κόσμος, vv. 21, 23, that they may believe and know that the Father hath sent Him. He cannot therefore mean here that He does not pray (absolutely) for the world, but that He is not now asking for the world, does not pray this thing for the world. These (obs Séδωκάς μοι) have already believed and known; the prayer for them is therefore a different one, viz. that in vv. 11, 15. The mistake would be at once precluded for English readers by the paraphrase, I am praying for them; I am not praying for the world. out ool elow-

in a fuller sense than σοι ήσαν, ver. 6. That was their preparation for Christ; this is their abiding in Him, which is abiding in the Father, see next verse. 10.] Compare ch. xvi. 15 and note. "It were not so much if He had only said, 'All Mine is Thine;' for that we may all say, that all we have is God's. But this is a far greater thing, that He inverts this and says, 'All Thine is Mine.' This can no creature say before God." Luther, Stier, v. 418, edn. 2. The E. V.,— 'All Mine are Thine,' &c., - gives the erroneous impression that persons only are meant, whereas it is all things, in the widest meaning, - the Godhead itself included, -of which this is asserted.

11. The occasion, and substance of His prayer for them. ούκ έτι είμὶ έν τω κ. This shews us that δ κόσμ. is not said of place alone, for the Lord Jesus is still here; but of state, the state of men in the flesh; sometimes viewed on its darker side, as overcoming men and bringing in spiritual death, -sometimes, as here, used in the most general sense. but; it expresses the simultaneous state of the Lord and His, see ch. xvi. 32, and α̈γιε] Holy, as applied to God, peculiarly expresses that penetration of all His attributes by LOVE, which He only who here uttered it sees through in its length, breadth, and height:—which angels (Isa. vi. 3: Rev. iv. 8) feel and express:—which men are privileged to utter, but can never worthily feel :- but which devils can neither feel nor worthily utter (see Mark i. 24). They know His Power and His Justice only. But His Holiness is especially employed in this work of τηρείν now spoken of. ἐν τῷ ἀν. σου, not 'through Thine own Name,' as E. V. which yet renders 'in Thy Name' ver. 12 (so Chrys., Theophyl., Euthym.), -but in the ovona of vv. 6 and 12: see below.

φ] Not only the best supported, but the best reading, though Stier maintains that it can bear no meaning χριστοπρεπώς.

The Name of God is that which was to be in the Angel of the Covenant, Exod. xxiii. 21, see also Isa. ix. 6: Jer. xxiii. 6.

This Name,—not the essential Godhead, but the covenant name, JEHOVAH OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS,-the Father hath given to Christ, see Phil. ii. 9; and it is the being kept in this, the truth and confession of this, for which He here prays. "That which the Son has given to His disciples is no other than that which He himself has received from the Father, viz. the essential revelation of the Father." Luthardt. Cf. Matt. x. 27. ϊνα ὧσιν εν καθ. ήμεις The oneness here is not merely harmony of will or of love, -as some have interpreted it, and then tried to weaken the Oneness of the Godhead by the καθώς,—but oneness by the indwelling of the Spirit of Christ, the gift of the covenant (1 Cor. vi. 17), and ultimately [as the close union implied by καθώς requires oneness of nature, 2 Pet. i. 4, where the ἐπαγγέλματα δεδώρηται answers to the ὄνομα ὁ δέδωκάς μοι here. The Righteonsness of the Father is witnessed by the beginning $(\pi\rho\delta \ \kappa a\tau. \kappa\delta\sigma.)$ of Redemption, and $(\kappa \dot{\alpha} \kappa \epsilon \hat{\nu} \nu a \delta \sigma. \nu)$ by the glorification of the elect from Christ; but also by $\delta \kappa \delta \sigma \mu o s \sigma \epsilon \ o \dot{\nu} \kappa \ \epsilon \gamma \nu \omega$,—the final distinction made by His justice between the world and His. The first $\kappa a \dot{\epsilon}$ is in the quasi-disjunctive usage so common with our Evangelist, see ch. xvi. 32, note,—and contrasts with the $\delta \dot{\epsilon}$ immediately following: the more classical construction would be $\tau \dot{\epsilon} = \delta \dot{\epsilon}$ (Lücke). The second $\kappa a \dot{\epsilon}$ merely couples the preceding to the following, as depending upon it: see Matt. xi. 27.

This έγνω, έγνωσαν, έγνώρισα, γνωρίσω, shew that our Lord spoke here of the then present time and disciples again, at the close of His prayer. The γνωρίσω is by the whole work and testimony of the Spirit completed in the Kingdom of God. This promise has been in fulfilment through all the history of the Church. And the great result of this manifestation of the Father's name is, that the wonderful Love wherewith He loved Christ, may dwell in (not the Apostles merely - the future γνωρίσω has again thrown the meaning onward to the great body of believers) them, -i. e. the perfect, living knowledge of God in Christ, which reveals, and in fact is, this love. And this can only be by κάγω ἐν αὐτοῖs-Christ dwelling in their hearts by faith, and renewing and enlightening them by His Spirit. He does not say, ' Thou in them '-but I in them and Thou in Me; see ver. 23.

OWN. And herein XVIII. 1-XIX. 16.7 His voluntary submission of Himself to His enemies and to the unbelief of Israel.

1-11.] His betrayal and apprehension. 1-3.] Matt. xxvi. 30-47. Mark xiv. 26-43. Luke xxii. 39-53. On the omission by John of the conflict of the Redeemer's soul in Gethsemane, I would remind the reader of what has been said in the Prolegomena on the character of this Gospel. The attempt to find in this omission a discrepancy between the setting forth of the Redeemer by John and the synoptic Gospels, is, as usual, unsuccessful. John presents us with most striking instances of the troubling of the human soul of Christ by the suffering which was before Him: see ch. xii. 23-27; xiii. 21. Compare notes on Matt. ver. 36, and throughout the section. κέδρων] This is evidently a Greek corruption of the Hebrew (קררוֹן); and coincides with the LXX in ref. and 3 Kings xv. 13, where however F (not A) has τοῦ κέδρων. If there were cedars in the ravine, the corruption would be easily accounted for. Suidas, under 'IaBiv, quotes Ps. lxxxii. 9 thus, 'Iaβlv εν τῷ χειμάρδφ τῶν κισσῶν. Instances of the practice of changing foreign names into other words bearing sense in the new language are common in all countries. This being so, it is perhaps safer to follow the best MSS., even against our own conviction, that St. John can hardly have written τῶν κέδρων. Josephus calls it χειμ. κεδρώνος, or φάραγξ κεδρώνος. Antt. viii. 1. 5; ix. 7. 3: see

2 Kings xxiii. 6, 12. The ravine in the bottom of which flows the Kidron, is to the East of Jerusalem, between the city and the Mount of Olives. Lücke suggests that the owner of this garden may have been friendly to (or a disciple of?) Jesus. It was called Gethsemane,-Matt., Mark. Traditions as to its site are, as usual, various. A square plot of ground in the depth of the ravine is now usually pointed out, and seems to have been fixed on at the time when the empress Helena visited Jerusalem, A.D. 326. Euseb. says Gethsemane was at the Mount of Olives: Jerome, at the foot of the mount. The language of Luke xxi. 37 leads to a belief that it may have been higher up the mount. Robinson, i. 346.

2.] often,—see Luke xxi. 37 [ch. viii. 1]. These accurate notices of our Evangelist are especially found in this last portion of his Gospel: cf. vv. 13, 24, 28; ch. xix. 14, 20, 41, &c. 3.7 See, on this band of men, note on Matt. ver. 47. Lücke refers to Dion. Hal. ix. (ἐξέτρεχον άπαντες έκ των σκηνών άθρόοι, φανούς έχοντες κ. λαμπάδας) to shew that lanterns and torches were part of the utensils of military on a night march. appear to be strictly torches, -any blazing substance held in the hand;—and λαμπά-δες, lights, fed with oil. 48-56. Mark xiv. 44-52. Luke xxii. 48-53. 4.] On είδως πάντα τὰ έρχ. see Matt. xxvi. 45. ἐξῆλθεν—probably, from the shade of the trees into the moonlight;—hardly, as De Wette and Lücke suggest, from some building in the τίνα ζητ., spoken,—as was the saying έφ' ὁ πάρει, Matt. xxvi. 50,—to carry reproof to the conscience of those addressed: and also to obtain for so solemn an act as the delivering Himself up to them, the formal declaration of their intention to take Him. "When men sought Him to make Him a king, He fled: now that they seek Him to put Him to death, He goes forth to meet them.' Stier, vi. 252, edn. 2. 5.] Some among them knew Him (Matt. xxvi. 55), others probably not. This answer may have been given by some one in authority among the Roman soldiers, who had it in command 'to apprehend Jesus of Nazareth.'

είστήκει μετ' αὐτῶν] I believe these words to be the description of an eyewitness; - John detected Judas standing among them, and notices the detail, as is his constant habit, by way of enhancing the tragic character of the history. The synoptic narrative related the kiss which presently took place: but this self-tradition of our Lord was not related in it. John therefore adds this touch of exactness, to shew that the answer Ίησοῦν τ. N. was not given because they were ignorant of His Person, so as not to be able to say 'Thee;'-but because they feared to say it. 6.7 The question on the miraculous nature of this incident is not whether it were a miracle at all (for it is evident that it must be regarded as one), but whether it were an act specially intended by our Lord, or a result of the superhuman dignity of His person and the majestic calmness of His reply. I believe the latter alternative to be the right one. Commentators cite various instances of the confusion of the enemies of innocent men before the calmness and dignity of their victims. how much more was this likely to be the case when He in whom was no sin, and who spake as never man spake, came forth to meet His implacable foes as the self-sacrificing Lamb of God. So that I regard it rather as a miracle consequent upon that which Christ said and did, and the state of mind in which His enemies were,-than as one, in the strict sense, wrought by Him: bearing however always in mind, that to Him nothing was unexpected, or a mere result, but every thing foreknown. With this view what follows is also consistent, rather than with the other. The distinction is an important one, as the view which we take of our Lord's mind towards His captors must enter, as an element, into our understanding of the whole of this scene, and indeed of the solemn occurrences which follow. Such incidents as this are not related by the Evangelists, and least of all by St. John, as mere astounding facts, but as grounds on which we are to enquire, and determine for ourselves, as to the "glory, full of grace and truth," which was in Him, whom, not having seen, we love. 8.] Bengel strikingly says of this $\epsilon \gamma \omega$ $\epsilon i \mu \iota$ "Tertio 5—12. This saying was sufficient to shew Peter and the rest what was the appointed course for them; -the ἄφ. τούτ. ύπάγειν to the band, is ὑπάγετε ὑμεῖς to the Apostles. 9. See ch. xvii. 12. An unquestionable proof, if any were wanted, that the words of ch. xvii. are no mere description of the mind of our Lord at the time, nor free arrangement of His words, but his very words themselves. This is recognized even by De Wette. the application of the saying, we may remark that the words unquestionably had a much deeper meaning than any belonging to this occasion; but that the remarks so often made in this commentary on the fulfilment of prophecies must be borne in mind;—that to 'fulfil' a prophecy is not to exhaust its capability of being again and again fulfilled:-that the words of the Lord have many stages of unfolding; -and that the temporal deliverance of the Apostles now, doubtless was but a part in the great spiritual safe-keeping which the Lord asserted by anticipation in these 10.] At this time took place the kiss of Judas, in accordance with the agreement entered into, and to assure the captors that the person thus offering Himself was indeed Jesus of Nazareth, and no substitute for him: see note on Matt. ver. 49. The other view, that the kiss took place first, before the incidents of our vv. 4-9 (Friedlieb, Archäologie der Leidensgeschichte, p. 68), is to me quite inconceivable. On Peter's act, see Matt. ver. 51. The names of Peter and Malchus are only found here: -τὸ δεξιόν only here and in Luke. The (external) ear, though severed, was apparently still hanging on the cheek ;-for our Lord is said in Luke xxii. 51, to have touched τοῦ ἀτίου αὐτοῦ in performing the healing.

hend and bind ONE, all gave their help: the cohort, the chiliarch, and the Jewish officers. This the Evangelist brings prominently forward, to shew how deep the impression of that previous incident still was: only by the help of all did they feel themselves secure. And thus it was ordered, that the disciples might escape with the more safety." 13.7 On Annas, see note Luke iii. 2. The influence of Annas appears to have been very great, and Acts iv. 6, he is called the High Priest, in the year following this. The whole matter is discussed in Friedlieb, Arch. der Leid. § 22. He ends by saying that the narrative evidently rests upon some arrangement with regard to the High Priesthood now unknown to us, but accountable enough by foreign influence and the deterioration of the priestly class through bribes and intrigues, to which Josephus and the Talmud sufficiently testify. This hearing is entirely distinct from that in the other Gospels. no questions are asked of Jesus about His disciples or doctrine (ver. 19): there witnesses are produced, and the whole proceedings are after a legal form. That hearing was in a public court of justice, before the assembled Sanhedrim; this was a private and informal questioning. That Annas should be so often called 'the High Priest,' is no objection to this view: see on Luke as above: see also note on ver. 24. The two hearings are maintained to be one and the same by Luther, Grot., Bengel, Lampe, Tholuck, Lücke, De Wette, Friedlieb, Wordsworth, &c.; -the view here taken is maintained by Chrys., Aug., Euthym., Olsh., Neander, Baumgarten-Crusius, Meyer, Ebrard, Wie-Baumgarten-Crustus, meyer, Loratu, weseler, Hase, Lange, Hess, von Meyer, von of Peter's denials discussed in notes on Matt. vv. 69-75. This first denial was to all appearance rashly and almost inadvertently made, from a mere feeling of shame. Lücke suggests that Peter may have set himself among the servants of the High Priest to bear out his denial. The μή καὶ σύ (ver. 25), as Luthardt remarks, implies that the other disciple had already been recognized as a follower of Jesus, and had escaped annoyance. 19.] This preliminary enquiry seems to have had for its object to induce the prisoner to criminate himself, and furnish matter of accusation before the Sanhedrim. μαθ., His party, or adherents, as the High Priest would understand His disciples to be; how many, and who they were, and with what object gathered together;and what His customary teaching of them had been. I believe the verse simply to describe what followed on the preceding: -Annas therefore sent Him bound to Caiaphas the High Priest. εἶτα, μηδὲ οὕτως εὐρίσκοντές τι πλέον, πέμπουσιν αὐτὸν δεδεμένον πρός Καϊάφαν, Chrys. There is no real difficulty in this rendering, if Annas and Caiaphas lived in one palace, or at all events transacted public affairs in one and the same. They would naturally have different apartments, and thus the sending from one to the other would be very possible; as also would the incident related by Luke xxii. 61: see the extract from Robinson, Matt. xxvi. 69, note.

torium that they might not be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover. For the entrance of a Jew into the house of a Gentile made him unclean till the evening. It is surprising, that according to this declaration of the Holy Evangelist, the Jews had yet to eat the Passover, whereas Jesus and His disciples had already eaten it in the previous night. And it is no less surprising, that the Jews in the early morning should have been afraid of rendering themselves unclean for the Passover,-since the Passover could not be kept till evening, i. e. on the next day, and the uncleanness which they dreaded did not, by the law, last till the next day. For this reason, the passage in John labours under no small exegetic difficulties, which we cannot altogether solve, from want of accurate knowledge of the customs of the time. Possibly the law concerning Levitical defilements and purifications had in that age been made more stringent or otherwise modified; possibly, they called some other meal, besides the actual Passover, by its name. This last we certainly, with our present knowledge of Hebrew antiquities, must assume; for the law respecting uncleanness will not allow us to interpret this passage of the proper Passover on the evening of the 14th of Nisan, nor indeed of any evening meal at all." The whole depends on this: can φαγείν τὸ πάσχα mean any thing else besides eating the paschal lamb in the strict sense? This is a question which in our day we have no power of answering; and, as De Wette has shewn (in loc.), none of the instances cited on the affirmative side are applicable. See note on ch. xix. 14.

Mr. Wratislaw, in his little volume of Sermons and Dissertations (Lond. J. W. Parker, 1859), has proposed a solution of the difficulties which is at least very ingenious. Its chief point is, that the Jews, reckoning their days from evening to evening, and also holding two evenings, the former beginning at 3 r.M., the other at sunset, the space between the evenings, during which the passover was to be sacrificed (Exod. xii. 6), might be reckoned in differently, sometimes as part of the preceding, sometimes as part of the following day. Then he thinks that in order to avoid any mistake, they considered the 14th Nisan to begin at 3 P.M. on Thursday, and to end at sunset on Good Friday, thus extending the day to its utmost possible limit. He instances similar confusion between the 14th and 15th Nisan, or rather Abib, in Exod. xii. 18 and Levit. xxiii. 6, arising from the space between the evenings being reckoned in the one case as belonging to the former, and in the other as belonging to the latter day; and suggests that the same ambiguity will account for Josephus's statement that the Jews kept the feast of unleavened bread for eight days. Thus, he says, any time after 3 P.M. on Thursday might be called by St. Mark "the first day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the passover," and by St. Luke, "the day of unleavened bread, when the Passover must be killed," it being killed after the first and before the second evening on Friday, and thus, loosely speaking, within the day, which commenced at 3 o'clock, and, strictly speaking, within that which commenced at sunset on Thursday. Similarly any time after 3 or sunset on the Thursday might be called the παρασκευή or preparation of the passover, which was to be eaten at some time after sunset on the Friday. Then he understands, that the disciples made all preparations on Thursday afternoon for the passover, which was to be killed the next afternoon, and eaten the following night: and that the passover of which our Lord so earnestly desired to partake, was that which was thus prepared, but of which He knew He was not Himself destined to partake. This he supports by the true reading (omitting the οὐκέτι) in "If this view," he Luke xxii. 16. adds, "be accepted, there is no longer any question, as far as the passover is concerned, about reconciling St. John with The eucharist the synoptical Gospels. will thus have been instituted at an ordinary meal, eaten the evening before the paschal feast in the same room in which it was intended afterwards to celebrate the passover." See this more fully illustrated in the vol. above alluded to, pp.

The main objections to it 168-175. seem to me to be, 1) the total absence of any trace of such an usage, of eating a preliminary solemn meal in the passoverchamber; 2) the plain and undeniable impression on the mind of every unbiassed reader of the synoptic Gospels, that the meal of our Lord and the Twelve was a passover, and that His ἐπιθυμία ἐπεθύμησα describes, not that which He desired to do, owing however to His predetermined course would not do,-but that which He was then doing in the fulfilment of that So that I am His earnest desire. afraid Mr. Wratislaw's ingenious solution leaves us, for all essentials of the question, where we were before: merely, by suggesting the introduction of possible new elements of confusion, giving us an additional warning not to be rash in assuming a discrepancy between the Evangelists, where computations of time may have been so vague and various.

29.] Though Pilate, having granted the service of the $\sigma\pi\epsilon\hat{i}\rho\alpha$ to the Sanhedrim, must have been aware of the circumstances under which Jesus was brought before him, he demanded a formal accusation on which legally to proceed: "se scire dissimulabat," Rupert. in Meyer. 30.] They do not mention the charge of blasphemy brought against Him by the Sanhedrim, for fear of the entire rejection of their cause, as by Gallio, Acts xviii. 16. The Procurators in such cases had a discretionary power. On what they did say, Grot. observes, "Quod probationibus deerat, id supplere volunt sua auctoritate."

31.] This answer is best regarded as an ironical reproach founded on their apparently proud assertion in ver. 30—and amounting to this:—¹If you suppose

I am to have such implicit confidence in your judgment concerning this prisoner as to take his guilt on your word, take him and put him to death (for κρίνατε must be thus understood, - see below) according to your law;' reminding them that the same Roman power which had reserved capital cases for his jurisdiction, also expected proper cognizance to be taken of them, and not that he should be the mere executioner of the Sanhedrim. ήμ. οὐκ ἔξ. From the time when Archelaus was deposed (A.D. 6 or 7), and Judga became a Roman province, it would follow by the Roman law that the Jews lost the power of life and death. Josephus tells us, Antt. xx. 9. 1, that οὐκ έξον ἢν χωρίς τῆς ἐκείνου (the Procurator's) γνώμης καθίσαι συνέδριον, -i.e. to hold a court of judgment in capital cases. Some have thought that this power was reserved to them in religious matters, as of blasphemy and sacrilege; but no proof has been adduced of this; the passages commonly alleged— Jos. Antt. xiv. 10. 2: B. J. vi. 2. 4, and Acts vii. 58, not applying (see note on Acts ut supra). The Tahmud relates that this had taken place forty years (or more, see Lücke, ii. 737 note) before the destruction of Jerusalem. Biscoe, on the Acts, pp. 134-167, argues at great length that the Jews had this power; and that the words here merely mean that they could not put to death on the Sabbath, which, according to the usual custom of executing the next day after judgment, would now have been the case. But this treatment of the word is unjustifiable. Can we suppose for a moment that this can have been meant, when there is not a word in the text to imply it? We may hope that the day for such forced interpretations ...xviii.

is fast passing away. Friedlieb (§ 31) gives the most consistent account of the matter. In the Roman provinces generally the Proprætor or Proconsul conducted judicial proceedings. But Judwa, which belonged to the province of Syria, was an exception. There was a Procurator cum potestate, who exercised the right of judicial cognizance. Jerusalem however possessed the privilege of judging all lighter causes before the three-andtwenty, and heavier causes, with the sole exception of judicia de capite, before the great Sanhedrim: so that none but these reserved cases remained for the Procurator. Pilate seems to have judged these cases at his visits during the festivals; which would fall conveniently for the purpose, it being the custom in Jerusalem, to execute great criminals at the Feasts. In other provinces the governors made circuits and held assizes throughout their jurisdictions. See on this subject Lücke's note, ii. 736.

32.] See Matt. xx. 19 al.: ch. xii. 32, 33. Had the Jews taken Him and judged Him, He would have been stoned, not crucified. And this whole section, vv. 28-32, serves to shew how the divine purpose was accomplished. 33.] This question probably arose out of what Pilate had previously heard, not from any charge to this effect being made between our vv. 31 and 34. Had such a charge been made, our Lord's question ver. 34 would be unnatural. Pilate summoned Jesus in, who had been as yet outside with the Jews. This was the formal reception of the case before him; -as the Roman soldiers must now have formally taken charge of Jesus, as servants of the Roman authorities: having previously, when granted by Pilate to the Chief Priests, acted as their police. The judgments of the Romans were always public and sub dio, see ch. xix. 13:-but the enquiries and examinations might be private. In this case Pilate appears to have wished to obtain an account from Jesus apart from the clamours of the chief priests and the 34.] On this whole interview, see note on Luke vv. 3, 4. this question ἀπὸ σεαυτ. κ.τ.λ. as intended to distinguish the senses of the word Keng as applied to Jesus: and of course not (De Wette, Lücke) for the information of Him who asked it, but to bring out this distinction in Pilate's mind. If he asked of himself, the word could certainly have but one meaning, and that one would be wrongly applied ;- if from information derived from the Jews, this very fact would open the way to the true meaning in which He was King of the Jews. Stier and Ebrard think there may be some reference in άπδ σεαυτοῦ to a momentary earnestness in Pilate's own mind,-a suspicion that his prisoner was what he was charged with being (see ch. xix. 8, 12), from the mention of which he immediately (ver. 35) recoils, and implies the other side of the dilemma. 35.] Pilate at once repudiates the idea of his having any share in Jewish expectations, or taking any personal interest in Jewish matters: all his information he has derived from the public accusation of the people and chief

The words are a pregnant proof of an Incarnation of the Son of God. This great truth is further expressed by ἐλήλυθα εἰς τ. κ.: 'I have been born, but not therein commencing my being-I have come into the world.' Thus certainly are the words to be understood, and not of his public appearance, his ανάδειξις (as Lücke, De Wette), nor as synonymous with γεγέννημαι. It is this saying which began the fear in Pilate, which the charge of the Jews, ch. xix. 7, τη άληθεία, not την αλήθειαν: not 'the truth,' so that what He said should be true, -but to the Truth, in its objective reality: see ch. xvii. 17, 19, of which deep saying this is the popular exposition for his present hearer.

The Lord, besides, sets forth here in the depth of these words, the very idea of all kinghood. The King is the representative of the truth: the truth of dealing between man and man ;-the truth of that power, which in its inmost truth belongs to the great and only Potentate, the King of Kings. Again, the Lord, the King of manhood and the world, the second Adam, came to testify to the truth of manhood and the world, which sin and Satan had concealed. This testimony to the Truth is to be the weapon whereby His Kingdom will be spread ;- 'every one who is of the truth,' i. e. here in the most general sense, every one who is a true dealer with his own heart, who has an ear to hear,—'of such are my subjects composed:—they hear my voice.' But for the putting this true dealing on its proper and only ground, see ch. viii. 47; vi. 44.

38.] To this number Pilate did not belong. He had no ear for Truth. His celebrated question is perhaps more the result of indifferentism than of scepticism; it expresses, not without scoff and irony, a conviction that truth can never be found: and is an apt representative of the state of the polite Gentile mind at the time of the Lord's coming. It was rather an inability than an unwillingness to find the He waits for no answer, nor did the question require any. Nay, it was no real question, any more than Ti έμοι κ. σοί, or any other, behind which a negation lies hid. έγω ούδεμ. alτ....] ἐγώ, opposed to ὑμεῖs, who had found fault in Him. Pilate mocks both-the Witness to the Truth, and the haters of the Truth. His conduct presents a pitiable specimen of the moral weakness of that spirit of worldly power, which reached its culminating point in the Roman empire.

39.] At this place comes in Matt. xxvi. 12—14;—the repeated accusation of Jesus by the chief priests and elders, to which He answered nothing; -and Luke xxiii. 5-16, the sending to Herod, and second proclama-tion of His innocence by Pilate,—after which he adopts this method of procuring His release (Luke, ver. 17). συνήθ.] See note Matt. xxvii. 15, and compare, for an instructive specimen of the variations in the Gospel narratives, the four accounts of this incident. 40.7 They have not before cried out in this narrative: so that some circumstances must be pre-supposed which are not here related: unless vv. 30 and 31 be referred ην δè ὁ B. λ.,—in Mark xv. 7 and Luke xxiii. 19, a rioter; -but doubtless also a robber, as such men are frequently found foremost in civil uproar. There is a solemn irony in these words of the Apostle—a Robber! See the contrast strongly brought out, Acts iii. 14.

Luthardt (after Krafft) remarks on the parallelism with Levit. xvi. 5-10. Thus was Jesus "the goat upon which the Lord's lot fell, to be offered for a sinoffering." See the same idea expanded by Mr. Wratislaw, in the first of the sermons in his volume. CHAP. XIX. 1.7 The reason or purpose of this scourging does not here appear; but in Luke xxiii. 21-23 we read that after the choice of Barabbas, Pilate asked them what should be done with Jesus? And when they demanded that He should be crucified, Pilate, after another assertion of his innocence, said παιδεύσας αὐτὸν ἀπολύσω. Thus it is accounted for. 2, 3. κ. ἤρχοντο accounted for. πρ. αὐτ.] This has been perhaps erased as not being understood. It was their mock-reverential approach, as to a crowned king: coming probably with obeisances and pretended homage. In the χαίρε δ β. τ. πορφύραν, Mark ver. 17. 4. The unjust and cruel conduct of Pilate appears to have had for its object to satisfy the multitude by the mockery and degradation of the so-called King of the Jews: and with that view he now brings forth Jesus. His speech is equivalent to—'See what I have done purely to please you—for I believe Him innocent.' Ver. 5 is the accurate and graphic delineation of an eyewitness, and intimately connected with the speech of Pilate which follows. For the ίδου ὁ ἄνθ. is to move their contempt and pity; - 'See this man who submits to and has suffered these indignities-how can He ever stir up the people, or set Himself up for King? Now cease to persecute Him; your malice surely ought to be satisfied.' 6.] This had been cried before, see Matt. ver. 22 and parallels. Possibly St. John had not heard the cry. According as men have been in different parts of a mob, they will naturally report differently, according as those nearest to them cried out. λάβ. αὐτ. ὑμ. The words of Pilate shew vacillation between his own sense of the innocence of Jesus and his fear of displeasing the Jews and their rulers. He now, but in ironical mockery, as before, ch. xviii. 31, delivers the matter entirely into their hands: perhaps after having received the message from his wife, Matt. ver. 19.

7. In consequence of this taunt, they now declare the cause of their condemnation of Him-see Levit. xxiv. 16-and their demand that, though found innocent by the governor, He should die. 8.7 This charge served to increase the fear which Pilate had before : see note on ch. xviii. 37. The name υίὸς θεοῦ served also to confirm the omen already furnished by the dream of his wife. That this fear was not a fear of the Jews, nor of acting unjustly, but of the Person of Jesus, is evident from what follows. 9.] He entered, taking Jesus with him.

πόθεν-i. e. not 'from what province?'for he knew this, Luke xxiii. 6, 7: nor, 'of what parents?'—but whence? in reference to vids θεοῦ: cf. πόθεν γένος εὔχεται εἶναι, Hom. Od. ρ. 373. Observe that the fear of Pilate is not mere superstition, nor does it enter into the Jewish meaning of vibs θ .: but arises from an indefinite impression made on him by the Person and bearing of our Lord. We Person and bearing of our Lord. We must not therefore imagine any fear of Him as being a 'son of the gods,' in Pilate's mind (so even Luthardt): this gives a wrong direction to his conduct, and misses the fine psychological truth of the narrative. Our Lord, in His silence, was acting according to His own precept, Matt. vii. 6. Notwithstanding Pilate's fear of Him, he was not in earnest; -not determined to be led by his conscience, but had already given way to the unjust demands of the people; and He who saw his heart, knew how unworthy he was of an answer to so momentous a question. Besides, this silence was the most emphatic answer to all who had ears to hear it ;-was a reference to what He had said before, ch. xviii. 37, and so a witness to His divine origin. Would any mere man, of true and upright character, have refused an answer to such a question, so put? Let the modern rationalist consider this. 10.] As in ch. xviii. 35, Pilate at once recoils from his better conscience into the state-pride of office. "Objurgans increpatio timori præcedenti plane contraria." Lampe. This very boast was a self-conviction of injustice. No just judge has any such power as this, to punish or to loose (see 2 Cor. xiii. 8); but only patiently to enquire and give sentence according to the truth.

έμοί, emphatic: it perhaps being implied, 'Thou hast, I know, refused to reply to others before.' anodioal first seems most natural, as appealing most to the prisoner: σταυρώσαι follows, as the alternative in case the other is rejected. 11.7 This last testimony of our Lord before Pilate is a witness to the truth: opening in a wonderful manner the secret of Pilate's vaunted power, of His own humble submission, and the sinfulness of His enemies. This saying, observes Meyer, breathes truth and grace. The great stress is on the word avwder, on which Grotius strikingly says (ungewöhn= lich treffend, Stier), "inde scilicet, unde ortus sum!" so that it answers remarkably to the $\pi \delta \theta \epsilon \nu$ above. We must not dream of any allusion to Rome, or the Sanhedrim, in this avwber, as the sources of Pilate's power:-the word was not so meant, nor so understood: see ver. δεδομένον, not δεδομένη: - the neuter is more general, requiring the supply, as Meyer, of τὸ ἐξουσιάζειν κατ' ἐμοῦ,—and embraces in itself the whole delegation from above, power included q.d. except by appointment from above. Lampe (in loc.) remarks: "Concedit Pilato (1) potestatem. Agnoscebat fori humani authoritatem, quia regnum ejus non erat terrenum, humanos magistratus destruens. Neque Pilato et Romanis jus in Judæos disputabat. (2) Exaggerat illam potestatem, ut superne datam. Hæc est doctrina Christiana, omnem potestatem esse a Deo (Rom. xiii. 1, 2). (3) Agnoscit potestatem illam se in Seipsum extendere, cum omnia secum ex decreto divino agerentur (Acts iv. 28)." διὰ τοῦτο] on this account, viz. because of what has just been asserted, où κ eixes $\kappa.\tau.\lambda$. The connexion is somewhat difficult. I take it to be this: 'God has given to thee power over me; -not insight into the character which I claim, that of being the son of God-but simply power: that insight belonged to others, viz. the Sanhedrim, and their president, whose office it was to judge that claim; they have judged against the clearest evidence and rejected me, the Son of God; thy sin, that of blindly exercising thy power, sin though it be, is therefore less than theirs, who being God's own people, and with God's word of prophecy before them (and the High Priest, with his own prophetic word before him, -see ch. xviii. 14), deliberately gave me over into thy hand.' It is important to this, which I believe to be the only right understanding of the words, to remember that Pilate, from ver. 6, was making himself simply their tool; -He was the sinful, but at the same time the blind instrument of their deliberate malice. Nearly so Lücke and De Wette. Bengel and Stier understand "quia Me non nosti" as the subject of διὰ τοῦτο, but Lücke rightly says that δεδομ. άνωθεν, and nothing else must be that subject. So Meyer also. ὁ παραδιδ., beyond question, Caiaphas, - to whom the initiative on the Jewish side belonged; "cujus authoritate omnia agebantur," Lampe. At the same time the whole Sanhedrim are probably included under the guilt of their chief. In this άμαρτίαν is an implied reference to a higher Judge-nay, that Judge Himself 12.] ἐκ τ., from this time; speaks. so De W., Lücke, &c.: Meyer, Stier, and Luthardt render it "on this account;" arguing that Pilate had before been endeavouring to deliver Him: but the words imply that from this time, he entirely set himself to deliver Him. Pilate himself was deeply struck by these words of majesty and mildness, and almost sympathy for his [own] weakness, and made a last, and, as ek T. seems to imply, a somewhat longer attempt than before, to deliver Him. φίλος τ. K. There does not seem to be any allusion to a title of honour, amicus Cæsaris; indeed, to judge from the citations in Wetstein, a good deal of fancy has been employed in making out the fact of such a title having been in use, any further than that the appellation would naturally arise and be accounted honourable. φίλ. τ. K. here is 'well affected to Cæsar.' This was a terrible saying, especially under Tiberius, with whom (Tacit. Ann. iii. 38) "majestatis crimen omnium accusationum complementum erat." $\pi \hat{a}_{s} \hat{b}_{s} \hat{b}_{s} \dots$ This was true: their application of it to Christ a lie. But words, not facts, are taken into account by tyrants, and this Pilate knew.

13.] τ. λόγων τούτων -viz. these two last remarks. "In such a perplexity, a man like Pilate could not long hesitate. As Caiaphas had before said, it were better that one even innocent man should die, than that all should perish: so now in like case Pilate decided rather to sacrifice Jesus though innocent, than to expose himself to so great danger." Friedlieb, Arch. der Leid. § 34. έξω] See The Bnua was in front on ch. xviii. 33. of the prætorium, on an elevated platform; -Gabbatha, probably from azz, altus fuit, -which was paved with a tessellated pavement. Such a pavement Julius Cæsar carried about on his expeditions, Suct. Cres. 14. παρασκευή του π. The signification, 'Friday in the Passover week' (using παρασκευή for 'day before the sabbath, as reff. Matt., Luke, and τοῦ π. as in σάββατον τοῦ π. Ps.-Ign. ad Philip. c. 13, p. 937, ed. Migne), has found many and some recent defenders: see especially Wieseler, Chron. Synops. i. 335 ff. But this is not its natural meaning, nor would it ever have been thought of in this place, but for the difficulty arising from the whole Passover question, which I have discussed on Matt. xxvi. 17-19, and on ch. xviii. 28.

תמף. του π. answers to חקבה ביני, and is 'the vigil of the Passover,' i.e. the day preceding the evening when the passover was killed. And so it must be understood here, especially when connected with ch. xviii. 28. See on the whole matter the notes above referred to. ωρα ως εκτη] There is an insuperable difficulty as the text now stands. For Mark relates, ch. xv. 25, that the crucifixion took place at the third hour: and that it certainly was so, the whole arrangement of the day testifies. For on the one hand, the judgment could hardly have taken the whole day till noon: and on the other, there will not thus be time left for the rest of the events of the day, before the sabbath began. We must certainly suppose, as did Eusebius, Theophylact, and Severus (in the Catena, Lücke, ii. 756), that there has been some very early erratum in our copies; whether the interchange η Ματλ iii. 34. οι. 19 αΙ οι. 15 ο δασιλεὺς ύμῶν. 15 ο δκραύγασαν οὖν ἐκεῖνοι οι. 19 αΙ οι. 29 αΙ οι. 29 αΙ οι. 20 αΙ οι.

of Γ (3) and τ' (6), or some other, cannot now be determined. Lücke and Friedlieb defend the sixth hour: but the above difficulties seem to me decisive against it.

We certainly may approximate the two accounts by recollecting that as the crucifixion itself certainly did not (as in Mark) take place exactly at the third hour, and as here it is ώρα ώς έκτη, some intermediate time may be described by both Evangelists. But this is not satisfactory: see note on Mark xv. 25. The solution given by Bp. Wordsworth after Townson and others, that St. John's reckoning of the hours is different, and like our own, so that the sixth hour = 6 A.M., besides being unsupported by any authority (see ch. i. 39; iv. 6, 52; xi. 9, and notes), would leave here the difficulty that there must thus elapse three hours between the hearing before Pilate and the Crucifixion. Besides which, we may ask, is it possible to imagine St. John, with the other Gospels before him as these expositors believe him to have had, adopting without notice an independent reckoning of his own which would introduce utter confusion into that history which (again on their hypothesis) he wrote his Gospel to complete and clear The words ide o Bao. up. seem to have been spoken in irony to the Jews -in the same spirit in which afterwards the title was written over the cross:partly perhaps also, as in that case, in consequence of the saying in ver. 12,-to sever himself altogether from the suspicion there cast on him. 15.] οὐκ ἔχ. βασ. εί μη K.,—a degrading confession from the chief priests of that people of whom it was said, "The Lord your God is your King." 1 Sam. xii. 12. "Jesum negant usque eo, ut omnino Christum negent," Bengel. However, it furthered the present purpose, and to this all was sacrificed, including truth itself; for the confession was not only degrading, but false in their mouths. Some of those who now cried this, died miserably in rebellion against Cæsar forty years afterwards. Here the scourging seems (Matt., Mark) to have taken place, or perhaps to have been renewed, since the former one was not that customary before execution, but conceded by Pilate to the mob in hope of satisfying them.

habit of not naming himself might extend to his mother (he names his father, ch. xxi. 2), we may well believe that h άδελφή τ. μητρός αὐτοῦ here represents Salome, and that four women are designated by this description. So Wieseler and Meyer, Luthardt opposing them. So also Ewald: and, which is no mean evidence, the Peschito, inserting a kal between aυτοῦ and Maρία. ἡ τοῦ κλωπᾶ, wife of Klopas (Alphæus, see Matt. x. 3, and Prolegg, to Ep. of James, § i. 4), the mother of James the Less and Joses: Matt., Mark. 26. 18è ô viôs σου] The relationship in the flesh 26. 182 6 between the Lord and His mother was about to close; hence He commends her to another son who should care for and protect her. Thus,-as at the marriage in Cana, when His official independence of her was to be testified, so now,-He addresses her as youal. 27.7 The solemn and affecting commendation of her to John is doubly made, - and thus bound by the strongest injunctions on both. The Romanist idea, that the Lord commended all His disciples, as represented by the beloved one, to the patronage of His mother, is simply absurd. The converse is true: He did solemnly commend the care of her, especially indeed to the beloved disciple, but in him to the whole cycle of disciples, among whom we find her, Acts 1. 14. No certain conclusion can be drawn from this commendation, as to the 'brethren of the Lord' believing on Him or not at this time.

The reasons which influenced Him in his selection must ever be far beyond our penetration :- and whatever relations to Him we suppose those brethren to have been, it will remain equally mysterious why He passed them over, who were so closely connected with His mother. Still the presumption, that they did not then believe on Him, is one of which it is not easy to divest one's self; and at least may enter as an element into the consideration of the whole subject, beset as it is with uncertainty. ἀπ' ἐκ. τ. ὥρας is probably to be taken literally,-from that time;so that she was spared the pangs of witnessing what was to follow. If so, John returned again to the Cross, ver. 35.

εis τὰ ίδια need not imply that John had a house in Jerusalem. It would equally apply to his lodging during the feast; only meaning, that henceforth, wherever he was, she was an inmate with him; and certainly that his usual habitation was fixed, and was his own.

Ewald remarks (see Meyer in loc.), "It was for the Apostle in his later years a sweet reward to recall vividly every such minute detail,—and for his readers a sign that he alone could have written all this."

28.] μετὰ τοῦτο is generally, but not necessarily, immediate. Here we must suppose the ¿λωt ¿λωt to have been said meantime, and the three hours' darkness to have taken place. Perhaps during some of this time John was absent: see ίνα τελ. ή γρ.] Various needless objections have been raised to the application of these words to the saying of the Lord which follows, and attempts have been made (by Luthardt and Meyer among others: see on the other hand Ewald) to connect them with τετέλεσται (τετέλεσται, Ίνα τελειωθή). That St. John does use Iva . . . as applying to what follows, ch. xiv. 31 shews. And so here, - that the Scripture might be accomplished' (not πληρωθή), having it in view to leave no pre-appointed particular of the circumstances of his suffering unfulfilled, Jesus, speaking doubtless also in intense present agony of thirst, but only speaking because He so willed it, and because it was an ordained part of the course which He had taken upon Him, said this word. That was now over, -the redemption of man accomplished, - and from this time "the joy that was set before Him" begins. It is beyond the purpose of a note to bring out the many meanings of this most important and glorious word. There is an admi-rable sermon on it by Schleiermacher (vol. ii. serm. 10); and Stier's Comment, vi. 473 ff., should be read. τ. κεφαλήν] We have the minuteness of an eye-witness, on whom every particular of this solemn moment made an indelible impression. παρέδωκεν τὸ πνευμα-viz. in the words given by Luke, πάτερ, είς χειράς σου παρατίθεμαι το πνευμα, -which was also the φωνή μεγάλη πνευμα, - which was also the φωνη μεγαλη of Matt. and Mark. bath. ίνα κατεαγ.] The crurifragium was sometimes appended to the punishment of crucifixion, see Friedlieb, p. 164,but does not appear to have been inflicted for the purpose of causing death, which indeed it would not do. Friedlieb supposes that the term involved in it the coup de grâce,' which was given to all executed criminals, and that the piercing with the spear was this death-blow, and was also inflicted on the thieves.

34. The lance must have penetrated deep, for the object was to ensure death,and, see ch. xx. 27, probably into the left side, on account of the position of the soldier, and of what followed.

alμa κ. ὕδωρ] The spear perhaps pierced the pericardium or envelope of the heart, in which case a liquid answering the description of $\[\[\] \delta \omega \rho \]$ may have flowed with the blood. But the quantity would be so small as scarcely to have been observed. It is hardly possible that the separation of the blood into placenta and serum should so soon have taken place, or that, if it had, it should have been by an observer described as αίμα και ὕδωρ. It is more probable that the fact, which is here so strongly testified, was a consequence of the extreme exhaustion of the Body of the Redeemer. The medical opinions on the point are very various, and by no means satisfactory. Meyer's note is well worth consulting. His view after all seems to be the safe and true one-that the circumstance is related as a miraculous sign, having deep significance as to the work of the Redcemer, and shewing Him to be more than mortal. It can be no reason against this, that, as Ewald urges, St. John does not here dwell on any such typical significance, nor can I see how, as he maintains, 1 John v. 6 ff. can be understood without reference to this fact: see note there. This emphatic affirmation of the fact seems to regard rather the whole incident than the mere outflowing of the blood and water. It was the object of John to shew that the Lord's Body was a real body, and underwent real death. And both these were shewn by what took place: not so much by the phænomenon of the water and blood, as by the infliction of such a wound,-after which, even had not death taken place before, there could not by any possibility be life remaining. So Lücke: except that he seems to refer έωρακώς more to the whole circumstances of the death of Jesus.

The third person gives solemnity. It is, besides, in accordance with St. John's way of speaking of himself throughout the Gospel.] Meyer is for keeping ἀληθινή here to its strict sense, not true, but genuine, real. Perhaps the best account to be given of the word is to be found in the use of $\lambda\eta\theta\hat{\eta}$ immediately afterwards of the matter of the testimony. The things related are $\partial \lambda \eta \theta \hat{\eta}$: the narrative of them is ἀληθινή, a narrative of truth. Some have fancied that by the use of *kervos here, the narrator necessarily signifies not himself, but some third person. But it has been shewn above (see note on ch. vii. 29) that St.

John constantly uses ekelvos merely as emphatically taking up again the main subject of the sentence. The use of πιστεύειν in John makes it probable that he lays the weight on the proof of the reality of the death, as above. The iva depends on the three preceding clauses, without any parenthesis, as the final aim of what has gone before: in order that; not, 'so that.'

36.] 'For'-i.e. as connected with the true Messiahship of Christ, 'these things were a fulfilment of Scripture.' It is possible that Ps. xxxiii. 20 (LXX) may be also referred to; -but no doubt the primary reference is to the Paschal Lamb of Exod., as in reff. : see 1 Cor. v. 7.

37.] LXX, $\epsilon \pi \iota \beta \lambda \epsilon \psi o \nu \tau \alpha \iota \pi \rho \delta s \mu \epsilon$, $\dot{\alpha} \nu \theta'$ $\dot{\omega} \nu \kappa \alpha \tau \omega \rho \chi \dot{\eta} \sigma \alpha \nu \tau \sigma$ — but the Evangelist has given the literal and, as now acknowledged (Lücke), true sense of the word The oworat does not refer to the Roman soldiers,-but to the repentant in the world, who, at the time the Gospel was written, had begun to fulfil the prophecy: and is not without a prophetic reference to the future conversion of Israel, who were here the real piercers, though the act was done διὰ χειρὸς àνόμων. 38-42.] His Burial.

38.] μετὰ ταῦτα—not, 'immediately after this'—but 'soon after.' The narrative implies, though it does not mention (as Mark and Luke do), that Joseph himself took down the Body from the cross. Lücke thinks the soldiers would have done this: but their duty seems only to have extended to the ascertaining of the fact of death. The ἀρθῶσιν of ver. 31 need not imply, 'by their hands.'

39.] John alone mentions Nicodemus. The Galilæan narrative had no previous trace of him, and does not recognize him here. Joseph bore too prominent a part not to be mentioned by all. Luthardt beautifully remarks on the contrast between these men's secret and timid discipleship before, and their courage now, "Their love to Jesus was called out by the might of His love. Power which constrains men. And thus this act of love on the part of both these men is a testimony for Jesus, and for the future effect of His death. Hence also it appears why the Evangelist mentions the weight of the spices, as a proof of the greatness of their love, as Lampe obσμύρνης, myrrh, -the gum serves." of an aromatic plant, not indigenous in Palestine, but in Arabia Felix, see reff. and Exod. xxx. 23: Prov. vii. 17 (Hebr. and E. V.): Cant. iii. 6, and Winer, Realwörterbuch, ii. 126 (edn. 3). the name of various sorts of aromatic wood in the East,—see Winer, Realw. i. 54. Both materials appear to have been pulverized (the wood by scraping or burning?) and strewed in the folds of the linen in which the body was wrapped (De Wette). The quantity is large; but perhaps the whole Body was encased, after the wrapping, in the mixture, and an outer wrapper fastened over all. The proceeding was hurried, on account of the approaching Sabbath: and apparently an understanding entered into with the women, that it should be more completely done after the Sabbath was over. This plentiful application of the aromatic substances may therefore have been made with an intention to prevent the Body, in its lacerated state, from incipient decomposition during the interval.

40. See ch. xi. 44. Little is known with any certainty, except from these passages, of the Jews' ordinary manner of burying. Winer, Friedlieb. 41.] See note on Matt. ver. 60. The words ἐν τῷ τόπφ όπου ἐσταυρώθη are so far in favour of the traditional site of the Holy Sepulchre, that Calvary and the Sepulchre are close together, under the roof of the same church. And those who have found an objection in that circumstance have forgotten this testimony of John. Karvov and therefore given for the purpose-so that the additional particular not here mentioned, that it belonged to Joseph, is almost implied. The newness of the tomb was important, that it should be seen "neminem præter Jesum, neque Jesum alterius virtute, ut olim circa sepulchrum Elisæi acciderat, resurrexisse" (Lampe): so that (Luthardt) no room might be left for the evasions of unbelief. 42.] την παρασκ. τ. 'Ιουδ. seems to indicate clearly the παρασκ. of the Passover, as I have before maintained that the words mean; not the mere day of the week so called, which, as it was by the Christians also in which as to was by the the Apostles' time named παρασκευή, would not be qualified by τῶν Ἰονδ.

The words ὅτι ἐγγ. ἦν τὸ μν. certainly at first sight appear as if John were not aware that the tomb belonged to Joseph; but it is more likely that the thought of asking for the body may have been originally suggested to Joseph by his possessing a tomb close to the place of crucifixion, and so ὅτι ἐγγ. ἢν τὸ μν. may have been the real original reason of the whole proceeding: and John, not anxious to record every particular, may have given it as such.

counts:-I believe all such attempts to be fruitless; -and I see in their failure strong corroboration of the truth of the evangelic narratives. It is quite impossible that so astounding an event, coming upon various portions of the body of disciples from various quarters and in various forms, should not have been related, by four independent witnesses, in the scat-tered and fragmentary way in which we now find it. In the depth beneath this varied surface of narration rests the great central fact of the Resurrection itself, unmoved and immoveable. As it was THIS above all other things to which the Apostles bore their testimony, so, in their testimony to this, we have the most remarkable proof of each having faithfully elaborated into narrative those particular facts which came under his own eye or were reported to himself by those concerned. Hence the great diversity in this portion of the narrative :and hence I believe much that is now dark might be explained, were the facts themselves, in their order of occurrence, before us. Till that is the case, (and I am willing to believe that it will be one of our delightful employments hereafter, to trace the true harmony of the Holy Gospels, under His teaching of whom they are the record,) we must be content to walk by faith, and not by sight. We must also remember in this case, that our Evangelist is selecting his points of narration with a special purpose,—to shew us how the belief of the disciples was brought out and completed, after the unbelief of Israel: cf. vv. 30, 31.

1, 2. Map. ή Mayδ.] She was not alone (Matt., Mark, Luke). Does this appear in the σίδαμεν below? This is not, as Meyer says, precluded by the σίδα in ver. 13. Mary there speaks in her own person, which she might do however accompanied. Still, probably not. She uses the plural as involving all the disciples in her own feeling of ignorance and of consequent sorrow. So Meyer: and it is more natural to take it thus. One thing we may conclude for certain, that she, for some reason, did not see the vision related in Matt., Mark, and Luke.

3.] Luke, ver. 12, speaks only of Peter's going. Meyer directs attention to the interchange of aorists and graphic imperfects in this and the following verse.

4—8.] Full of most interesting and characteristic detail. John, probably the younger, outruns Peter;—but when there, reverently (not "ne pollueretur," as Wetst.) abstains from entering the sepulchre. The ardent and impetuous Peter goes directly in—John follows—and believes. What can exceed the inner truth of this description? And what is not related, is as full of truth as that which is. For, vv. 6, 7, we seem to hear the very voice of Peter describing to his companion the inner state of the tomb. Οη σουδ. Notice βλέπει, of the cursory see reff. glance of John, who did not go in,θεωρεί, of the exhaustive gaze of Peter who did. Notice also that John when he stooped and looked in saw only the δθόνια, which seem to have been lying where the Feet were, nearer the entrance, whereas Peter, on going in, saw the σουδάριον which was perhaps deposited further in, near the place of the Head. Nor should, as Meyer observes, the minute distinction of κείμενα τὰ ὀθόνια in ver. 5 and τὰ οθόνια κείμενα in ver. 6, be altogether overlooked. 8. ¿πίστευσεν Nothing is said of Peter-did he believe too? I think not;—and that John modestly suppresses it. But what did John believe? Was it merely, "corpus fuisse translatum, ut dixerat Maria?" (Bengel, so August., Erasm., Grot., Stier, Ebrard.) Surely not; the facts which he saw would prevent this conclusion: nor does John so use the word πιστεύειν. He believed that Jesus was risen from the dead. He received into his mind, embraced with his assent, THE FACT OF THE RESURREC-TION, for the first time. He did this, on the ocular testimony before him; for as yet neither of them knew the Scripture, so as to be à priori convinced of the certainty that it would be so. But (see above) Peter does not seem to have as yet received this fach:-accounting probably for what he saw as Mary had done. Lampe beautifully says "Concludinus, ab hoc momento in ipsis monumenti tenebris animum Joannis fide salvifica resurrectionis Jesu, tanquam novo quodam orti solis justitiæ radio, collustratum fuisse." 10.7 Luke has the very same expression, $\partial \pi \hat{\eta} \lambda \theta \epsilon \nu$ $\pi \rho \delta s$ $\dot{\epsilon} \alpha \nu \tau \dot{\delta} \nu$. This is remarkable, as he evidently has a fragment of the same inciπρὸς ἐαυτ., to their lodging. 11.7 She had come with them, but more slowly. είστήκει, was standing, strictly imperfect: not 'had been standing.' 12.] From what has been said above, my readers will not expect me to compare the angelic appearances in the four Gospels. What wonder, if the heavenly hosts were variously and often visible on this great day, when "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?" What can be more accurate in detail than this description of the vision of Mary? Every word was no doubt carefully related to the Apostle, and as carefully recorded. And all is significant: they are in white, because from the world of light: they sit, as not defending, but peacefully watching the Body: at the Head and the Feet, for the Body of the Lord was from head to foot in the charge of His Father and of His servants. (Luthardt.) 13.7 Here again the finest psychological truth underlies the narrative. The other women (Mark, ver. 5: Luke, ver. 5) were afraid at the vision; but now Mary, having but one thought or desire, to recover the lost Body of her Lord (τον κύριον μου), feels The angels doubtless are no fear. proceeding further to assure her as they did the women before :- but this is broken off by the appearance of the Lord Himself, or perhaps by Mary's turning away.

14.] ἐστράφη-having her attention attracted by the consciousness of some one [being] present near her—not perhaps by the approach of Jesus. Or it might be (Stier, Ebrard) with intent to go forth and weep again, or further to seek her Lord. Chrysostom's reason is very beautiful, but perhaps hardly probable: καὶ ποία αὕτη ἀκολουθία, πρὸς ἐκείνους διαλεγομένην, καλ μηδέπω μηδέν ἀκούσασαν παρ' αὐτῶν, στραφήναι πρὸς τὰ ὀπίσω; έμοὶ δοκεῖ ταῦτα λεγούσης αὐτής, ἄφνω φανεὶς ὁ χριστὸς ὅπισθεν αὐτής ἐκπλήξαι τοὺς άγγέλους, κάκείνους θεασαμένους του δεσπότην, και τῷ σχήματι, και τῷ βλέμματι, καλ τῷ κινήματι εὐθέως ἐμφῆναι, ὅτι του κύριον είδον και τουτο την γυναϊκα ἐπέστρεψε, καὶ εἰς τὰ ὀπίσω στραφηναι ἐποίησεν. Homil. in Joann. lxxxvi. 1. We need not surely enquire too minutely, why she did not know Him. The fact may be psychologically accounted forshe did not expect Him to be there, and was wholly preoccupied with other thoughts: or, as Diäseke (cited by Stier, vii. 12, cdn. 2) says, "Her tears wove a veil, which concealed Him who stood before her. The seeking after the Dead prevents us from seeing the Living."

15.] The same kind of repetition
by the Lord of what the angel had before said is found in Matt. xxviii. 7-10. It is idle to enquire why she thought Him to be the gardener (see specimens of such speculations in Lücke and Stier in loc.): but I may once for all observe that we must believe the clothing of His risen Body to have been that which He pleased to assume; not earthly clothing, but perhaps some semblance of it. Certainly, in this case, He was clothed; - or she must at once have recognized Hun. But see on στραφείσα below.

στραφείσα seems to imply that she had not been looking full at Him before. ραββουνί] See ref.: , either

That she gives way to no impassioned exclamations, but pours out her satisfaction and joy in this one word, is also according to the deepest psychological truth. The addition of και προςέδραμεν ἄψασθαι αὐτοῦ (see digest: so also, but with προέδραμεν, the cursives 13, 346) is an explanatory gloss to μή μου απτου -but doubtless a correct one. "It was the former name with which He called her: His former appellation in which she replied; and now she seeks to renew the former intercourse." (Luthardt.)

17.] The connexion between the prohibition and its reason is difficult, and has been very variously given. See a complete discussion of the exegetical literature of the passage in Stier, vi. 640-667. The sense seems to me to be connected with some gesture of the nature alluded to in the gloss above quoted, but indicating that she believed she had now gotten him again, never to be parted from Him. This gesture He reproves as unsuited to the time, and the nature of His present appearance. 'Do not thus-for I am not yet restored finally to you in the body-I have yet to ascend to the Father.' This implies in the background another and truer touching, when He should have ascended to the Father. "Vis me tangere, Maria; vis omnino frui amicitia mea: id nunc non licet, quum tantum οἰκονομικῶs, ad fidem vestram roborandam me do conspiciendum. At ubi ad Patrem ascendero, veniet tempus quum frui mea amicitia perfectissime poteris, non terrestri contactu, sed tali qui loco illi, i. e. cœlo conveniat, spirituali." Grotius. With this my view nearly agrees, not confining (as indeed neither does he) the latter enjoyment to in cœlo, but understanding it to have begun here below. So Leo the Great, Serm. lxxiv. (al. lxxii.) 4, p. 295: "Hine illud est quod post resurrectionem suam Dominus Mariæ Magdalenæ personam Ecclesiæ gerenti cum ad contactum ipsius properaret accedere dicit; Noli me tangere, nondum enim ascendi ad Patrem meum: hoc est, nolo ut ad me corporaliter venias, nec ut me sensu carnis agnoscas: ad sublimiora te differo, majora tibi præparo: cum ad Patrem ascendero, tunc me perfectius veriusque palpabis, apprehensura quod non tangis, et creditura quod non cernis." The two renderings of $\tilde{a}\pi\tau\sigma v$ to be guarded against are, (1) a laying hold of to retain (= $\mu\dot{\eta}$ $\mu\epsilon$ $\kappa\rho d\tau\epsilon \iota$), (2) a laying hold of to worship (ἐκράτησαν αὐτοῦ τοὺς πόδας Matt. xxviii. 9). Neither of these senses can be extracted from the word without forcing.

πορεύου δέ] Stier remarks that this was a far greater honour than that which had been forbidden her;—just as the handling of the Lord allowed to Thomas was a far less thing than the not seeing and τους άδελφ. μου] Βυ yet believing. this term He testifies that He has not put off his humanity, nor his love for his own, in his resurrection state: see Heb. ii. 11.

19.] The circumstance of the doors

19.] The circumstance of the doors being shut is mentioned here and in ver. 26, to indicate what sort of appearances these were. Suddenly, unaccounted for by any approach,—the Lord rendered Himself visible to His disciples. Nor did this affect the truth of that resurrection Body, any more than his withdrawing himself from mortal sight occasionally affected the truth of His fleshly Body. Both were done by that supernatural power dwelling in Him, by which His other miracles were wrought. It seems to have been the normal condition of His fleshly Body, to be visible to mortal eyes :-- of His risen Body, not to be. But both these He could suspend when He pleased, without affecting the substance or truth of either. δια τ. φόβ. τ. 'louδ. This was natural enough; the bitter hatred of the Jews (both people and rulers) to their Master, - and his own prophetic announcements,-would raise in them a dread of incipient persecution, now that He was removed. ηλθεν-not, by ordinary approach; nor, through the closed doors; -nor in any visible manner; -but (subjectively, of Himself) the word describes that unseen arrival among them which preceded His becoming visible to them. έστη εἰς τ. μ.] Compare Luke, ver. 36, έστη ἐν μέσω. ciples seem to have handled Him: see Luke, ver. 39: 1 John i. 1, and below, 21.7 'Peace be unto you' is solemnly repeated, as the introduction of the sending which follows. The ministers and disciples of the Lord are messengers of peace. This view is more natural than that of Euthym.: ὑπὸ πολλη̂s χαρᾶς ως εἰκὸς θορυβοῦντας καταστέλλει, ίνα προς έχωσιν οίς μέλλει έρειν.

καθώς] He confirms and grounds their Apostleship on the present glorification of Himself, whose Apostleship (Heb. iii. 1) on earth was now ended, but was to be continued by this sending forth of them. This commission was not now first given them, but now first fully assured to them: and their sending forth by Him their glorified Head, was to be, in character and process, like that of Himself by the 22. To understand this verse as the outpouring of the Spirit, the fulfilment of the promise of the Comforter, is against all consistency, and most against John himself: see ch. xvi. 7, and ch. vii. 39. To understand it rightly, we have merely to recur to that great key to the meaning of so many dark passages of Scripture, the manifold and gradual unfolding of promise and prophecy in their fulfilment. The presence of the Lord among them now was a slight and temporary fulfilment of His promise of returning to them; and so the imparting of the Spirit now, was a symbol and foretaste of that which they should receive at Pentecost:-just as, to mount a step higher, that itself, in its present abiding with us, is but the first-fruits and pledge (Rom. viii. 23: 2 Cor. i. 22) of the fulness which we shall hereafter inherit. "The relation of this saying to the effusion of the Spirit is the same which chap. iii. bears to Baptism, chap. vi. to the Lord's Supper, chap. xvii. 1 to the Ascension, ' (Luthardt.) Further: this giving of the Spirit was not the Spirit's personal imparting of Himself to them, but only a partial instilling of His influence. He proceeds forth in His work (as in His essence) from the Father and the Son:

this breathing of His influence was an imparting of Him from the Son in His risen Body, but that Body had not yet been received up, without which union of the God-manhood of the Son to the glory of the Father the Holy Spirit would not come. What was now conferred is plain from our ver. 23-by which authority to discern spirits and pronounce on them is re-assured (see Matt. xviii. 18) and from Luke, ver. 45, by which a discerning of the mind of the Spirit is given to them. We find instances of both these gifts being exercised by Peter in Acts i., in his assertion of the sense of Scripture, and his judgment of Judas. Both these however were only temporary and imper-That no formal gifts of Apostleship were now formally conferred, is plain by the absence of Thomas, who in that case would be no apostle in the same sense in which the rest were.

ἐνεφύσησεν (see reff.) was the word expressing the act of God in the original infusion of the spirit of life into man. This act is now by God incarnate repeated, sacramentally (see λάβετε, Matt. xxvi. 26 ||), representing the infusion of the new life, of which He is become by His glorified Humanity the source to his members: see Job xxxiii. 4: Ps. xxxiii. 6: 1 Cor. xv. 45. 23.] The present meaning of these words has been spoken of above. They reach forward however beyond that, and extend the grant which they re-assure to all ages of the Church. The words, closely considered, amount to this: that with the gift and real participation of the Holy Spirit, comes the conviction, and therefore the knowledge, of sin, of righteousness, and judgment; -and this knowledge becomes more perfect, the more men are filled with the Holy Ghost. Since this is so, they who are pre-eminently filled with His presence are pre-eminently gifted with the discernment of sin and repentance in others, and hence by the Lord's appointment authorized to pronounce pardon of sin and the contrary. The Apostles had this in an especial manner, and by the full indwelling of the Spirit were enabled to discern the hearts of men, and to give sentence on that discernment: see Acts v. 1-11; viii. 21; xiii. 9. And this gift belongs to the Church in all ages, and especially to those who by legitimate appointment are set to minister in the Churches of Christ: not by successive delegation from the Apostles, -of which fiction I find in the N. T. no trace, - but by their mission from Christ, the Bestower of the Spirit for their office, when orderly and legitimately conferred upon them by the various Churches. Not however to them exclusively,-though for decency and order it is expedient that the outward and formal declaration should be so :- but in proportion as any disciple shall have been filled with the Holy Spirit of wisdom, is the inner discernment, the kpious, his.

with Stier (vii. 117, edn. 2), to think that it could not have been accidentally (Lücke), nor "negotio aliquo occupatus" (Grot.). On such a day, and in such a man, such an absence must have been designed. Perhaps he had abandoned hope;-the strong evidence of his senses having finally convinced him that the pierced side and wounded hands betokened such a death that revivification was impossible. 25.] He probably does not name the Feet, merely because the Hands and Side would more naturally offer themselves to his examination than the Feet, to which he must stoop. He requires no more than had been granted to the rest: but he had their testimony in addition, and therefore ample ground for faith to rest on. Olshausen ealls him the "Rationalist among the Apostles" Meyer lavs some stress on τόπον being used (see var. readd.) instead of τύπον in the second place: "τύπος videtur, τόπος impletur," Grot.;—he would see the τύπος, but place his finger in the τόπος. Olshausen, that this appearance was in Galilee. The whole narrative points out the same place as before. The eight days' interval is the first testimony of the recurring day of the Resurrection being commemorated by the disciples:-but, it must be owned, a weak one; -for in all probability they had been thus assembled every day during the interval. It forms however an interesting opening of the history of THE LORD'S DAY, that the Lord Himself should have thus selected and honoured it. 27. Our Lord says nothing of the τύπος τῶν ἡλων-He does not recall the malice of his enemies.

The words imply that the marks were no scars, but the veritable wounds themselves;-that in His side being large enough for a hand to be thrust into it. This of itself would shew that the resurrection Body was bloodless. It is φέρε κ. ίδε in the case of the hands, which were exposed—but merely φέρε κ. βάλε in the case of the side, which was clothed. So μή γ. ἄπιστ., Meyer: but query? not merely, 'Do not any longer disbelieve in my Resurrection; -but Be not (do not become)—as applied generally to the spiritual life, and the reception of God's truth — faithless, but believing. The E. V. is excellent. That Thomas did not apply his finger or his hand, is evident from ὅτι ἐώρακάς με below.

28.] The Socinian view, that these words, δ κύρ. μου κ. δ θεός μου, are merely an exclamation, is refuted-(1) By the fact that no such exclamations were in use among the Jews. (2) By the εἶπεν αὐτῷ. (3) By the impossibility of referring δ κύριός μου to another than Jesus: see ver. 13. (4) By the N. T. usage of expressing the vocative by the nom, with an article.

(5) By the utter psychological absurdity of such a supposition: that one just convinced of the presence of Him whom he deeply loved, should, instead of addressing Him, break out into an irrelevant cry. (6) By the further absurdity of supposing that if such were the case, the Apostle John, who of all the sacred writers most constantly keeps in mind the object for which he is writing, should have recorded any thing so beside that object. (7) By the intimate conjunction of πεπίστευκας -see below. Dismissing it therefore, we observe that this is the highest confession of faith which has yet been made; -and that it shews that (though not yet fully) the meaning of the previous confessions of His being 'the Son of God' was understood. Thus John, in the very close of his Gospel (see on vv. 30, 31) iterates the testimony with which he began it-to the Godhead of the Word who became flesh: and by this closing confession, shews how the testimony of Jesus to Himself had gradually deepened and exalted the Apostles' conviction, from the time when they knew Him only as & vids τοῦ Ἰωσήφ (ch. i. 46), till now when He is acknowledged as their LORD and their 29.] The ὅτι ἐώρ. blames the slowness and required ground of the faith: the πεπίστευκας recognizes and commends the soundness of that faith just confessed.

Meyer remarks on the perf. πεπίστευκας, "thou hast become believing and now believest," and the aorr. ιδόντες and πιστεύσαντες, which are not usitative (an usage never occurring in the N. T.), but indicate the state of those described from the time of the μακαριότης predicated of them, "who never saw, and yet became believers." sentences (see a remarkable coincidence Luke i. 45), indicate the present state of those spoken of, grounded in the past.

Wonderful indeed, and rich in blessing for us who have not seen Him, is this, the closing word of the Gospel. For these words cannot apply to the remaining Ten: they, like Thomas, had seen and believed. "All the appearances of the forty days," says Stier (vii. 139, edn. 2), "were mere preparations for the believing without seeing." On the record of them, we now believe: see 1 Pet. i. 8.

This is faith in Himself, as the Christ the Son of God: and the Evangelist means, that enough is related in this book to be a ground for such a faith, by shewing us His glory manifested forth (see ch. ii. 11). πιστ. ζωήν έχ. Thus he closes almost in the words of his prologue, ch. i. 4, 12. ἐν τῷ ὀν. αὐτ. (see reff. Acts, 1 Cor.) is the whole standing of the faithful man in Christ,-by which and in which he has life eternal.

CHAP. XXI. 1-23.] THE APPENDIX. THE GLIMPSE INTO THE FUTURE. And herein, 1-8] The significant draught of fishes. I reserve the remarks on this chapter to the end, thereby better to put the reader in possession of the evidence which I shall there gather up into one, but which will present itself as we go on. I will only state here, that whether written by John himself or not, it is evidently an appendix to the Gospel, which latter has already concluded by a formal review of its contents and object at ch. xx. 30, 31.

1. μετά ταῦτα] Compare ch. v. 1; vi. 1: at a subsequent time. έφαν. έαυτ. This expression is no where else used by John of the Lord's appearances, but only in Mark xvi. 12, 14. We have however φανέρωσον σεαυτόν, ch. vii. 4; and έφ. την δόξαν αὐτοῦ, ch. ii. 11; and the passive of φανερόω is very usual with him. The use of the verb here indicates that the usual state of the Lord at this time was not manifestation, but invisibility to them.

ἐπὶ τῆς θ., elsewhere, see reff., used by John with a dative in this sense. The expression indicates the locality, not the manner, of the appear-

The junction of ἀπό with a proper name is in John's style: see ch. i. 45; xi. 1; xix. 38. οί τοῦ Ζεβ. are no where else named by John ;they may however be here mentioned as in reminiscence of the draught of fishes which occurred before: see Luke v. 1 ff.

έπίασαν οὐδέν—as before, Luke The correspondence of this account with that is very remarkable—as is also their entire distinctness in the midst of that correspondence. The disciples must have been powerfully reminded of that their former and probably last fishing together. And after the "fishers of men" of that other occasion, the whole could not but bear to them a spiritual meaning in reference to their apostolic commission:their powerlessness without Christ,-their success when they let down the net at His word. Their present part was not to go fishing of themselves, but περιμένειν τ. έπαγγελίαν τοῦ πατρός, Acts i. 4 (Lu-4. έστη εls] See reff. The number here is clearly not that of all appearances of Jesus up to this time, for that to Mary Magdalen is not reckoned; but only those to the disciples,—i. e. any considerable number of them together. This one internal trait of consistency speaks much for the authenticity and genuineness of the addition. $\epsilon \gamma \epsilon \rho \theta \epsilon i s$] The participle is not found elsewhere in John, but the participial construction is found in ch. iv. 54. Without agreeing with all the allegorical interpretations of the Fathers, I cannot but see much depth and richness of meaning in this whole narrative. The Lord appears to His disciples, busied about their occupation for their daily bread; speaks and acts in a manner wonderfully similar to His words and actions on a former memorable occasion, when we know that by their toiling long and taking nothing, but at his word enclosing a multitude of fishes, was set forth what should befall them as fishers of men. Can we miss that application at this far more important epoch of their apostolic mission? Besides, He graciously provides for their present wants, and invites them to be His guests: why, but to shew them that in their work hereafter they should never want but He would provide? And as connected with the parable, Matt. xiii. 47 ff., has the net enclosing a great multitude and yet not broken, no meaning? Has the 'taking the bread and giving to Any one who recognizes the teaching character of the acts of the Lord, can hardly cast all such applications from him; -and those who do not, have yet the first rudiments of the Gospels to learn. 15-23.7 The calling, and its prospect. 15. ὅτε our po. There appears to have been nothing said during the meal. Surely every word would have been recorded. One great object of this appearance, observes Stier, certainly was the confirmation, and encouragement of the "fisher of men," in his apostolic office.

Σίμων Ἰωάννου] A reminiscence probably of his own name and parentage, as distinguished from his apostolic name of honour, Cephas, or Peter, see ch. i. 43. Thus we have Σ. βαριωνᾶ, Matt. xvi. 17, connected with the mention of his natural state of flesh and blood, which had not revealed to him the great truth just coufessed—and Luke xxii. 31, "Simon, Simon," when he is reminded of his natural weakness. See also Mark xiv. 37, and Matt. xvii. 25, where the significance is not so plain. πλέον τούτων] more than these thy fellow-disciples: compare Matt. xxvi. 33: Mark xiv. 29, "Though all should be offended, yet not I." That John does not record this saying, makes no difficulty here; nor does it tell against the genuineness of this appen-dix to the Gospel. The narrator tells that which he heard the Lord say, and tells it faithfully and literally. That it coincides with what Peter is related to have said elsewhere, is a proof of the authenticity, not of the connexion, of the two accounts. τούτων has been strangely enough understood (Whitby, Bolten) of the fish, or the "employment and furniture of a fisherman:"-Olshausen sees a reference to the pre-eminence given to Peter, Matt. xvi. 19,-and regards the words as implying that on that account he really did love Jesus more than the rest; -but surely this is most improbable, and the other explanation the only likely or true one. Perhaps there is also a slight reference to his present just-shewn zeal, in leaping from the ship first to meet the Lord. 'Has thy past conduct to Me truly borne out thy former and present warmth of love to Me above these thy fellows?' "Mira Christi sapientia, qui tam paucis vocibus efficit, ut Petrus et sibi satisfaceret, quem ter negaverat, et collegis quibus se prætulerat; -exemplum dans disciplinæ ecclesiasticæ." Grot.

Peter's answer shews that he understood the question as above. He says nothing of the πλέον τούτων—but dropping all comparison of himself with others, humbly refers to the Searcher of hearts the genuineness of his love, however the past may seem to have called it in question.

The distinction between ayamav and φιλείν must not here be lost sight of, nor must we superficially say with Grotius, "Promiscue hic usurpavit Johannes ἀγαπαν et φιλείν ut mox βόσκειν et ποιμαίνειν (see below). Neque hic quærendæ sunt subtilitates." If so, why do the Lord's two first questions contain ἀγαπᾶς while Peter's answers have φιλώ-whereas the third time the question and answer both have φιλείν? This does not look like The distinction seems to be accident. that ayamav is more used of that reverential love, grounded on high graces of character, which is borne towards God and man' by the child of God; -whereas φιλείν expresses more the personal love of human affection. Peter therefore uses a less exalted word, and one implying a consciousness of his own weakness, but a persuasion and deep feeling of personal love. (Hence it will be seen that in the sublimest relations, where, all perfections existing, love can only be personal, Φιλείν only can be used, see ch. v. 20.) Then in the third question, the Lord adopts the word of Peter's answer, the closer to press the meaning of it home to him. συ οίδας, the two first times, seems to r Matt. ii. 6. Acts xx. 28. A refer to the Lord's personal knowledge of Peter's heart-in His having given him that name, ch. i. 43, in Matt. xvi. 17: Luke xxii. 31, and the announcement of his denial of Him. The last time, he widens this assertion 'Thou knowest me,' into 'Thou knowest all things,' being grieved at the repetition of a question which brought this Omniscience so painβόσκε τὰ ἀρν. fully to his mind. This and the following answers of the Lord can hardly be regarded as the reinstating of Peter in his apostolic office, for there is no record of his ever having lost it: but as a further and higher setting forth of it than that first one Matt. iv. 18 ff., both as belonging to all of them on the present occasion, and as tending to comfort Peter's own mind after his fall, and reassure him of his holding the same place among the Apostles as before, owing to the gracious forgiveness of his Lord.

We can hardly with any deep insight into the text hold Bookew and ποιμ. to be synonymous (Grot. above, Lücke, De Wette, Trench), or ἀρνία, πρόβατα, and προβάτια. The sayings of the Lord have not surely been so carelessly reported as this would assume. Every thing here speaks for a gradation of meaning. The variety of reading certainly makes it difficult to point out exactly the steps of that gradation, and unnecessary to follow the various interpreters in their assignment of them: but that there is such, may be seen from Isa. xl. 11: 1 John ii. 12, 13. Perhaps the feeding of the lambs was the furnishing the apostolic testimony of the Resurrection and facts of the Lord's life on earth to the first converts; the shepherding or ruling the sheep, the subsequent government of the Church as shewn forth in the early part of the Acts; the feeding of the προβάτια, the choicest, the loved of the flock, the furnishing the now maturer Church of Christ with the wholesome food of the doctrine contained in his Epistles. But those must strangely miss the whole sense, who dream of an exclusive primatial power here granted or confirmed to him. A sufficient refutation of this silly idea, if it needed any other than the έλυπήθη of this passage, is found in the συμπρεσβύτερος of 1 Pet. v. 1, where he refers apparently to this very charge: see note on Matt. xvi. 17 ff. "Illud, 'plus his' (πλέον τούτων), indicio est, Petrum hic restitui in locum suum, quem amiserat per abnegationem (but see above) simulque quiddam ei præ condiscipulis tribui, sed nihil a quo cæteri excludantur. Nam sane etiam hi amabant Jesum. Desinat tandem hoc ad se, et ad se unum rapere, qui nec amat nec pascit, sed depascit, per successionis Petrinæ simulationem. Non magis Roma, quam Hierosolyma aut Antiochia aut quivis alius locus ubi apostolum Petrus egit, Petrum sibi vindicare potest: imo Roma minime, caput gentium: nam Petrus erat in apostolis circumcisionis. Unum Romæ proprium est, quod apostolorum, etiam Petri sanguis in ca reperietur." Bengel. 16. πάλιν δεύτερον] The words are found together in John iv. 54. 17. dileis | See above ἐλυπήθη—not merely on on ver. 15. account of the repetition of the question, but because of to tpitov, the number of his own denials of Christ.

But this says nothing of ποίφ θανάτφ, on which the stress evidently is, and which Bleek, while he recognizes, endeavours to get rid of by strangely supposing the idea to have arisen after the death of Peter.

19.7 This remark is entirely in John's manner, see ch. ii. 21; vi. 6; vii. 39; xii. 33; as may be also the δοξάζειν τ. θ. used of such a death, see ch. xiii. 31 f.; xvii. 1.

He had made this so plain, that it needed not expressing. There was also a forcible reminding Peter of the first time when he had heard this command on the same shore, Matt. iv. 19.

at in the background. It seems that Peter either was at the time of the foregoing conversation walking with Jesus, and turned round and saw John following,-or that he moved towards Him on the termination of it (but certainly not from a misunderstanding of the words άκολ. μοι, see ver. 21). I can hardly conceive Him moving away on uttering these words, and summoning Peter away in private. It seems in the highest degree un-The description of the disnatural. ciple whom Jesus loved is evidently inserted to justify his following, and is a strong token of John's hand having written this chapter: see ch. xiii. 23. 21. Peter's question shews that he had rightly understood the Lord's prophecy respecting him. He now wishes to know what should befall his friend and colleague, - ἀποδιδούς αὐτῷ την αμοιβην (for his similar service in ch. xiii. 23 just referred to) καὶ νομίσας αὐτὸν βούλεσθαι έρωταν τὰ καθ' αύτόν, εἶτα μὴ θαρβείν, αὐτὸς ἀνεδέξατο τὴν ἐρώτησιν. Chrysost. (Stier vii. 198, edn. 2.) This was not mere idle curiosity, but that longing which we all feel for our friends; of which Bengel says,-" Facilius nos ipsos voluntati divinæ impendimus, quam curiositatem circa alios, æquales præsertim aut suppares, deponimus." οὐκ ἀκολουθήσει σοι; οὺ τὴν αὐτὴν ἡμῖν όδὸν τοῦ θανάτου βαδιείται; Euthym. 22. The words τί πρὸς σέ; imply a rebuke;—not perhaps however so sharp a one as has been sometimes seen in them. They remind Peter of the distinctness of each man's position and duty before the Lord; and the ov por ak., which follows, directs his view along that course of duty and suffering, which was appointed for him by his Divine Master. Notice the emphatic expression of ou, and the emphatic position of µoi: q.d. 'His appointed lot is no element in thy onward course: it is ME that thou must follow.'

On the ἐἀν θέλω, three opinions have been held (for that which refers the words to John's remaining where he then was, on the shore, till the Lord returned from His colloquy with Peter, is not worth more than cursory mention): (1) that of Aug., Maldon., Grot., Lampe, Olsh., &c. (it being allowed on all hands, that $\mu \acute{e} \nu \acute{e} \iota \nu$ means to remain in this life: see reff. and ch. xii. 34), "If I will that he remain till I fetch him," i. e. by a natural death. But this is frigid, and besides inapplicable here. Peter's death, although by the hands of an ăllos, was just as much the Lord's 'coming for him,' as John's, and there would thus be no contrast. (2) That that 'coming of the Lord' is meant which is so often in the three Gospels alluded to (see especially notes on Matt. xxiv.), viz. the establishment in full of the dispensation of the Kingdom by the destruction of the nation and temple of the Jews. This is the view of some mentioned by Theophyl., of Bengel (see below), Stier, Dräseke, Jacobi, &c.—and is upheld by the similar place, Matt. xvi. 28. (3) That the Lord here only puts a case,-" Even should I will that he remain upon earth till My last coming-what would that be to thee?" This view is upheld by Trench, Miracles, p. 466, edn. 2; but I think must be rejected on maturer consideration of the character of the words of our Lord, in whose mouth such a mere hypothetical saying would be strangely incongruous, especially in these last solemn days of his presence on earth. The second view seems then to remain, and I adopt it with some qualification. the destruction of Jerusalem began that mighty series of events of which the Apocalypse is the prophetic record, and which is in the complex known as the 'COMING OF THE LORD,' ending, as it shall, with His glorious and personal Advent. This the beloved Apostle alone lived to see, according to ancient and undoubted tradition (Euseb. H. E. iii. 23). When De Wette (whom Lücke in the main follows: see also Mr. Elliott, Apocal. Alf. p. 160)

calls this interpretation ganz nichtig, and would interpret this answer by the current idea in apostolic times, that His coming was very near, he is assuming (1) that this was the idea of the Apostles themselves (see 2 Thess. ii. 2, 3: 2 Pet. iii. 3, 4, 8, 9); (2) that this answer is not that of our Lord, but apocryphal. If all that he says about the early expectations of the Church were granted, it would not follow that the view above taken is erroneous. And as to the chapter having been written after the death of John and the destruction of Jerusalem, see below. 23.] τοὺς ἀδελφούς is an expression of later date than any usually occurring in the Gospels. 467 note. The simple recapitulation of the words of the Lord shews that their sense remained dark to the writer, who ventured on no explanation of them; merely setting his own side of the apostolic duty over against that of Peter, who probably had already by following his Master through the Cross, glorified God, whereas the beloved disciple was, whatever that meant, to tarry till He came.

24, 25. IDENTIFICATION OF THE AU-THOR, AND CONCLUSION. See remarks 24.] περί τούτων and ταῦτα certainly refer to the whole Gospel, not merely to the Appendix-and are quite in John's style: see ch. xii. 41; xx. 31.

οίδαμεν is in John's style-see reff.: also 1 John iv. 14, 16 al. fr. On ότι άλ. ἐστ. see 3 John 12, and ch. v. 32. 25.] The purpose of this verse seems to be to assert and vindicate the fragmentary character of the Gospel, considered merely as a historical narrative: -for that the doings of the Lord were so many,-His life so rich in matter of record,-that, in a popular hyperbole, we can hardly imagine the world containing them all, if singly written down; thus setting forth the superfluity and cumbrousness of any thing like a perfect detail, in the strongest terms, -and in terms which certainly looked as if fault had been found with this Gospel for want of completeness, by some objectors.

The reader will have perceived in the foregoing comment on the chapter a manifest leaning to the belief that it was written by John himself. Of this I am fully con-vinced. In every part of it, his hand is $\\ \text{Acts x. 41} \quad \text{$\sigma \circ \text{$\sigma \ci plain and unmistakeable: in every part of it, his character and spirit is manifested in a way which none but the most biassed can fail to recognize. I believe it to have been added some years probably after the completion of the Gospel; partly perhaps to record the important miracle of the second draught of fishes, so full of spiritual instruction, and the interesting account of the sayings of the Lord to Peter; -but principally to meet the error which was becoming prevalent concerning himself. In order to do this, he gives a complete account, with all minute details, -even to the number of the fish caught, -of the circumstances preceding the conversation,and the very words of the Lord Himself; not pretending to put a meaning on those words, but merely asserting that they announced no such thing as that he should not die. Surely nothing can be more natural than this. External evidence completely tallies with this view. The chapter is contained in all the principal Mss.: and there is no greater variety of reading than usual. In these respects it differs remarkably from John vii. 53—viii. 11, and indeed from even Mark xvi. 9—20. Internal evidence of style and diction is nearly balanced. It certainly contains several words and constructions not met with elsewhere in John; but, on the other hand, the whole cast of it is his;-the copulæ are his ;-the train of thought, and manner of narration. And all allowance should be made for the double alteration of style of writing which would be likely to be brought about, by lapse of time, and by the very nature of an appendix,a fragment,-not forming part of a whole written continuously, but standing by itself. The last two verses, from their contents, we might expect to have more of the epistolary form; and accordingly we find them singularly in style resembling the Epistles of John.

On the whole, I am persuaded that in this chapter we have a fragment, both authentic and genuine, added, for reasons apparent on the face of it, by the Apostle himself, bearing evidence of his hand, but in a 'second manner,'-a later style;-probably (as I think is shewn, inter alia, in the simplicity of the oluan in ver. 25) in the decline of life. I cannot, with Luthardt, regard the last two verses as an addition by the Ephesian Church. If, as he thinks, the οἴδαμεν favours this view, does not the olµaı as much disfavour it? Nor does the ingenious reasoning of Bp. Wordsworth at all convince me that this chapter originally formed a part of the Gospel, or that the view here advocated arises from a "nonapprehension of the connexion between the 20th and 21st chapters." His à priori reason, that had it been an appendix afterwards added, we should have had two distinct editions of the Gospel, whereas now all the Mss. contain it, is not reliable, in the uncertainty which rests on the origin of our present MSS., and also on the length or shortness of the interval during which it may have been wanting to the Gospel.

NOTE ON CH. V. 2.

An interesting notice has been forwarded me respecting the probable locality of the pool of Bethesda. My correspondent believes that it must have been identical with Siloam, and thinks he has obtained evidence on the spot which renders this exceedingly probable. I subjoin an extract from his letter:—

"The excavation, near the Mosque of Omar, which from a comparatively recent date has been designated 'Bethesda,' lays claim to that title only from its proximity to the modern 'St. Stephen's Gate,' which is supposed to be near the site of the 'Sheep Gate' mentioned in Nehemiah, which again is only presumed to be the locality referred to in St. John as $\tau \hat{\eta}$

"The greater number of eye-witnesses reject this 'ditch of Antonia' on the evidence of a first impression, which being so general, is not to be despised. Dr. Robinson, the first to upset many similar legends, came at once to the conclusion, that wherever Bethesda had been, it was never in that ditch, and setting himself to discover a more probable substitute, unluckily pitched upon an even more unlikely spot, to wit, the 'Fountain of the Virgin,' which could never have been within Jerusalem or near to the 'Sheep Gate,' and, being a cave, into which you descend by a flight of steps, can by no stretch of imagination answer the requirements of a 'pool having five porches.' But he was directed to this spot from the singular coincidence presented by the phænomenon for which that fountain is celebrated. It seems curious that, having himself explored the narrow tunnel, which connects this cave with the well-established pool of Siloam; and having remarked that the pool, being supplied with water from the cave, necessarily shares the phænomenon, he should not have erected his porches upon the more eligible spot. For the Pool of Siloam, for any thing to the contrary in Nehemish or Josephus, might have been within the city wall; nay there is a strong probability that it was so, founded on the only intelligible use of the connecting conduit, namely, to supply the city with water in times of siege, and (as appears from its formation) without the knowledge of the besiegers. The solution seems to be that, as there was no necessity to upset the Pool of Siloam for the substitution of Bethesda or any thing else, its identity with any other spot never occurred to him.

"Dr. Kitto, who I believe never visited the places about which he so ably wrote, refused Robinson's theory, 1st, on the proper grounds of distance, and impossibility of porching the Virgin's cave; 2ndly, on the less reasonable objection, of an inconsistency between a regular descent of the angel, and an irregular action of the syphon. But upon a reference to the original this second objection falls through, for the expression there used, κατὰ καιρόν, simply conveys an impression of recurrence, and indeed our translation 'at a certain senson' does not seem to imply regularily.

"Armed therefore with Robinson's (in this respect) unimpeached hypothesis, and conceiving that a pool may have both a topographical and an eleemosynary designation-nay, concluding, that it had more names than one, from the expression έπιλεγομένη, we proceed to erect our στοάς over this pool of Siloam, to see how better it will steer clear of Kitto's first, and more reasonable, objection. And lo! we find the requisites for such a structure appear (I would rather say have never disappeared), -the remains of four columns built into the (north) east wall of the pool, and the remains of four corresponding columns, yet visible down the centre of the pool, as in the subjoined sketch,- clearly shewing that at a former period Siloam was half covered over. And it is something more than a coincidence, when we perceive that by such an arrangement the colonnade would be divided into exactly five equal portions, the whole being neither more nor less than a κολυμβήθρα πέντε στοὰς ἔχουσα. I need not say that this fact alone at sight, produced in my mind the strongest convic-

"The taste of the water of Siloam resembles flat Seltzer, and from Wilde's narrative we find its analysis is as near as possible the same as Harrogate, which you are aware is famed as a specific in cutaneous disorders. Dr. Wilde mentions that the people about believe in the efficacy of this water in similar diseases, particularly eye disorders; and of this I satisfied myself on the spot, though I was not fortunate enough to see it so used or to witness the bubbling.

"To this day such springs are as common in the East as with us. Invalids in great numbers resort to the hot springs at Tiberyeh (Tiberias), and there is something of the kind at Panias (Cæsarea Philippi). That the water should have been considered more efficacious immediately after the bubbling, seems not unnatural, and that such bubbling should have been ascribed to supernatural agency is much less so, when we remember, that the phænomenon defied explanation, until a quite late date,-at that date it could be scarcely supposed otherwise."

On this I may make one or two remarks, both by way of illustration, and as referring to objections which may be made to the supposition.

1. No meaning has ever been assigned to επὶ τῆ προβατικῆ which should affect this or any other view of the site of Bethesda.

2. It is perhaps hardly fair to lay stress on έν τοῖς Ίεροσολύμοις as implying that Bethesda was within the walls. The expression may be a wide one, as in ch. x. 22:

Luke xiii. 4: Acts ii. 5, &c.

3. On the other hand the long and crooked tunnel connecting the two fountains, which Robinson explored, would seem as if it could have served no other purpose than that of a secret means of water-supply unknown to besiegers; and if so, then perhaps it may be allowable to claim for the words έν τοῖς Ἱεροσολύμοις, as my correspondent does, the above meaning.

4. The fact of the two pools, the Fountain of the Virgin and Siloam, being simultaneously intermittent, was established by Robinson.

5. I am informed, that the "troubling of the pool" is exactly similar to what might be expected from a rush of water up through a narrow tunnel; and occurs at irregular intervals of from two or three days to a fortnight: depending on the quantity of rain that has recently fallen.

6. Robinson observed the drums of pillars under the water, but makes no comment on them, nor does he mention their number.

7. Irenæus, Hær. iv. 8. 2, p. 236, says of our Lord, "Et Siloâ etiam sæpe Sabbatis curavit: et propter hoc assidebant ei multi die Sabbatorum." And Prudentius (Contra Homuncionitas, 129 ff.) says :-

"Variis Siloa refundit

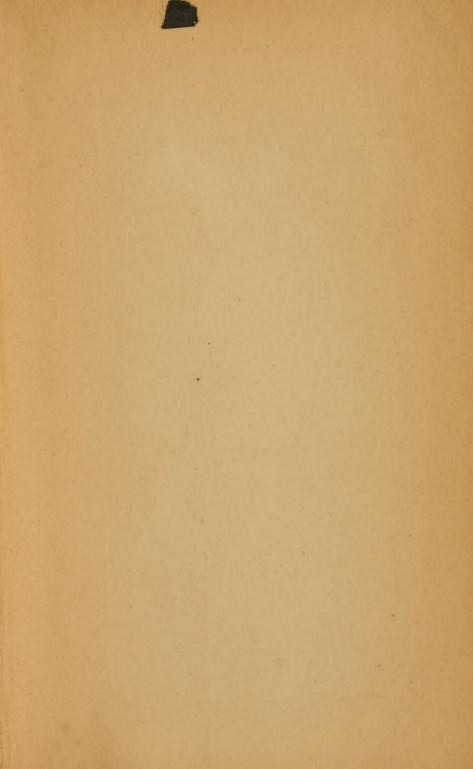

Momentis latices, nec fluctum semper anhelat, Sed vice distincta largos lacus accipit haustus. Agmina languentum sitiunt spem fontis avari, Membrorum maculas puro ablutura natatu: Certatim interea roranti pumice raucas Expectant scatebras, et sicco margine pendent."

And again, Enchiridion Vet. et Nov. Test. xxxiii.,-

"Morborum medicina latex, quem spiritus horis Eructat variis, fusum ratione latenti, Siloam vocitant : sputis ubi conlita cæci Lumina Salvator jussit de fonte lavari."

8. We have nothing to do with the descent of the angel, nor with the existence of any miraculous power in the water: the former existing only in the spurious part of the passage, and the latter being merely implied as matter of popular belief in the speech of the paralytic, ver. 7: see note there.

9. One objection will suggest itself: if the pools of Bethesda and Siloam were but one, why should St. John call it in ch. v. 2 by one name, and in ch. ix. 7 by another? An answer may perhaps be suggested: that the latter appellation is chosen by the Evangelist in ch. ix. 7, because of the mystical meaning there predicated of the word υ έρμηνεύεται απεσταλμένος.
